This is what I think about the situation in general. We are dealing with the same farmer who grew cotton for 5 and 6 cents per pound in the early thirties. That is why they voted for marketing quotas on December 15, 1949, and not because they were satisfied with their newly established allotment. They do have hopes, however, that some relief will be offered when Congress meets in January. Mr. BECKWORTH, I believe you will agree, it's no time for any one to be trying to place the blame on the other fellow for criticizing or grabbing glory. The welfare of many people are affected and cannot be helped by "passing the buck." I have confidence in Congress and the Department of Agriculture working out a program fair to the areas of the country that I mention.

Be assured of my sincere appreciation for your personal interest in this subject. With kindest regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

T. L. VINCENT,
Secretary, Panola County PMA.

HENDERSON, TEX., January 10, 1950.

Mr. BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regard to my farms. I have 278.02 acres of cultivated land and five tenant houses and they did not give me any land to work in cotton. It looks like I ought to have got some acres. Everybody around me got some acres but me. I would like for you to tell me how to get some land so the tenants can grow some cotton, if they don't get some it is going to be the worst depression that has been in this part of section for many years.

If there is any way you see to help me, will appreciate it.

Your friend,

H. E. PRICE.

JANUARY 11, 1950.

Mr. B. F. VANCE,
Production and Marketing Administration, Department of Agriculture, College Station, Tex.:

Please wire me immediately why you reserved only 3.7 percent for State reserve cotton acreage rather than 10 percent for reserve.

LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress.

Note why no higher percentage was reserved by the State committee:

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., January 11, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Less than 10 percent of State cotton allotment was reserved by committee for the reason that it was felt that the amount reserved was enough to take away from the stable cotton-producing area of Texas. Details relative to studies made by committee too voluminous to wire.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: About 300 to 400 additional acres would be given to Smith County if the 70-percent amendment were added. This is taking into consideration that we were required to adjust downward the reported acreage to get within the BAE figures. If the actual farmers' reported acreage were used as a basis it would greatly help this country.

The number of acres that we have to distribute to old cotton farms which grew cotton first since the war in 1949 is 600 acres, new farms will have to draw their allotment from this same 600 acres. There are 5,600 farms in this county. Only 2,190 of these were eligible to draw a regular cotton allotment. This leaves about 3,400 to draw their allotment from the 600 acres.

Up to the present time we have about 300 requests for this acreage, each day adds a good many more, and it is estimated that we will have at least 500 requests for this acreage by the time we are required to quit taking applications.

Trusting this to be the desired information, I am,

Sincerely,

DAN G. OWEN,
Secretary, Smith County PMA.

THE CAIN BANKING CO.,
Winnsboro, Tex., January 26, 1950.
UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT AGENCY,
Quitman, Tex.

GENTLEMEN: It is indeed very seldom that I am so aroused to the extent that I write a letter of this sort, but from actual facts that have come to my attention in the past weeks, I cannot but write and express my personal views concerning this new agricultural allotment program.

Let me give you a concrete example of the situation as it exists in Wood County: Yesterday a man came into my office, who started farming last year, and will in all probability need assistance in making a crop this year. He is a good man, and has a good credit rating with us. Yet this man is allowed no cotton allotment, and no peanut allotment on his place for the year 1950.

As a banker, I feel that it is my duty to make funds available to good farmers on a sound, conservative basis. My question, then, is this: How can I help the community and how can I help the farmers when in the beginning I know that it is impossible to hope for any repayment of a loan on such conditions. My second question is this: Is the government lending agency going to take care of farmers who are burdened by this limited acreage allotment? My third question is this: How is one of our east Texas farmers going to produce, and how is he going to live?

I am aware of the fact that this letter will in all probability create no adjustment of the many inequalities; yet I urge you to consider it, and if necessary forward it to the persons who control and promulgate your rules. I want my protest to be recorded.

Yours very truly,

MALVIN CAIN.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned farmers in the Ben Wheeler area of Van Zandt County, Tex., hereby protest the cotton program as passed to apply to 1950 acreage allotments.

We feel that the quota for this section of this county is inadequate for the maintenance of decent living standards.

We further object to its arrangements whereby it cuts the scale of acreage too low for new farmers and farmers who, on account of the war and postwar labor shortages, and the planting of wartime crops, were unable to plant their usual cotton acreage for a period of several years prior to the census taken to determine the acreage allotments for this area. A large number of our farmers are not represented or permitted to participate in the regulation of this measure as it is now set up; and

We respectfully request that you use every facility at your command to work this measure into more equitable and desirable form.

DEAR SECRETARY BRANNAN: I note several cotton States, including Texas, did not reserve the 10-percent cotton acreage their States offices could have reserved.

Did the Department of Agriculture advise these State committees to reserve the amounts reserved? Did it advise them not to reserve the amounts reserved? Was the Department consulted on this?

Please have the proper person call me when this is received.

DEAR SECRETARY BRANNAN: If a cotton farmer in a cotton county is given the allotment of 10 acres this year, 1950, and under the Cooley resolution releases it—the Cooley resolution now being considered—the House will he be assured the same 10 acres next year is he desires it, assuming the cotton acreage in his county remains the same? Will he be allowed to vote if he grows no cotton in 1950 or has no interest in any cotton that is grown in 1950?

I'd like this information on the Hill, if possible, before the vote comes on the resolution.

Regards,

LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Nashville, Tenn., January 19, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your communication of January 13, 1950, regarding the State committee reserve under the 1950 cotton marketing quota program, we desire to inform you that the State committee withheld 10 percent of the State acreage allotment for distribution to counties on the basis of historical trends in acreage, abnormal conditions affecting plantings, small farms, and applications for new farm allotments. All of this reserve has been distributed to cotton counties with the exception of that for new farm allotments which will be distributed after February 15, which is the closing date for applications for new farm allotments in Tennessee.

We believe that this reserve has been adequate from a State basis.

Very truly yours,

CARL FRY,
Chairman, State PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letters, one of which was dated January 3, 1950, two January 4, 1950, one January 5, 1950, and one January 13, 1950, with which you enclosed a copy of a telegram which you had received from Mr. Roy Selman, county judge of Crockett, Tex., dated January 3, 1950. You will note these telegrams are all exactly alike and were transmitted to us under five different memorandums on the dates described above.

Each of the inquiries is relative to the use of Bureau of Agricultural Economics data in the determination of cotton acreage allotments. Section 301 (c) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, provides that:

"The latest available statistics of the Federal Government shall be used by the Secretary in making the determinations required to be made by the Secretary under this Act." (7 U. S. C. 1940 ed. 1301 (c), February 16, 1938, 52 Stat. 43.)

Therefore, we have in accordance with the law used the latest available statistics of the Government in the determination of cotton acreage allotments.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 24, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: Your note of January 9 to the President with which you enclosed a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 3 has been referred to us for consideration.

I find that we have already given you our comments on the present cotton-acreage-allotment law, and our Solicitor and Acting Director of our Cotton Branch have discussed corrective measures with you.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., January 20, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of December 29, 1949, with reference to a letter you received from Mr. Forrest Gilbert, Rural Route No. 3, Grand Saline, Tex., concerning acreage allotments on cotton and peanuts.

It appears that the farm in which Mr. Gilbert is interested is not eligible for an old grower cotton allotment under the provisions of Public Law 272 because there was no cotton planted on the farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948, or regarded as planted in 1946 and 1947 under Public Law, 12. If Mr. Gilbert wishes to grow cotton on his farm in 1950, he should contact his county PMA committee and make application for a new farm cotton allotment. The State committee has established March 1, 1950, as the final date for applications for new farm allotments to be filed with the county committee, with the county committee having the privilege of setting an earlier closing date. In view of this, we suggest that Mr. Gilbert contact his county committee within the near future.

Under legislation contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, 1950 peanut acreage allotments are at this time being established by county PMA committees for farms on which peanuts were picked or threshed in one or more of the years 1947, 1948, and 1949. If Mr. Gilbert's farm did not have peanuts picked or threshed in any of these 3 years and if he wishes to apply for a new farm peanut allotment for 1950, he should contact his county PMA committee within the near future.

The producer indicates in his letter that he may possibly desire to plant peanuts for feed purposes. You may possibly wish to advise him that there will be no restriction in 1950 on the acreage of peanuts planted and hogged-off.

With reference to the eligibility of farmers to vote in the cotton referendum held December 15, 1949, it may be pointed out that farmers eligible to vote in this referendum were those engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year 1948.

We hope that we have made the matter clear to you. When we can be of further service to you, please advise.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State PMA Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 6 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Miss Cora Johnson, Longstreet, La. Miss Johnson had requested your assistance in securing cotton allotments for Panola County farmers.

As you know, 1950 farm cotton allotments have been determined in strict accordance with regulations and instructions issued by the Secretary of Agriculture. These are based on public laws passed by the Congress. Consequently, there is nothing that the State committee can do to increase farm allotments except as the Congress may provide in amendatory legislation. I believe suggestions made in my letter of this date, if enacted into law, will provide considerable relief, particularly in east Texas counties where small allotments have been established.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 7 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. B. B. Rabb, Point, Tex. Mr. Rabb suggested an alternate method of apportioning county cotton allotments to eligible farms in the county.

The suggestions made for making farm cotton allotments are substantially the same as those included in my letter of this date which was in reply to your letter of December 30. I believe the proposal has considerable merit, particularly for east Texas counties. It is also approximately the same proposal that was made by the Department of Agriculture spokesmen at the time recommendations were made to the first session of the Eighty-first Congress on ways and means of making farm cotton allotments.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., January 19, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 10 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. A. M. Mainer, route 3, Carthage, Tex. Mr. Mainer had requested your assistance in securing a larger cotton allotment for a neighbor's farm.

There is no indication in the letter that county and community committeemen have not established the 5-acre allotment in accordance with regulations and instructions issued from this office. However, if the neighbor of Mr. Mainer is dissatisfied with the allotment he should file an application for review with the local PMA secretary at Carthage, Tex. A duly constituted review committee will review the determination of the cotton allotment to see that it is fair and equitable and that it was determined properly.

There is a possibility that amendatory legislation now being considered by the Congress will increase the cotton allotment referred to above, but I can make no commitment since I do not know the provisions of the legislation that may be passed.

I regret that under the circumstances there is nothing that we can do here to increase the farm cotton allotment.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 11 in which you quoted a pertinent portion of a letter from Mr. J. Perrin Willis, box 5, Rusk, Tex. Mr. Willis had suggested an alternate method of making farm cotton allotments.

I do not agree with the suggestion made by Mr. Willis. Instead, it is my opinion (for diversified counties) that the county cotton allotment be apportioned among farms primarily on the basis of the average cotton history during the 3 years immediately preceding the year for which the cotton allotment is being made. Secondary factors of cropland, work stock and equipment, labor and adaptable soil, of course, need to be injected into this method of apportioning the cotton allotment. I do not recommend that this suggestion be extended to straight cotton counties where the percentage of cropland method in apportioning the county allotment is satisfactory and workable. In this manner, State and county committees will have considerable latitude in making farm cotton allotments and in minimizing the percentage reduction in average cotton acreage on small farms. Also, at the same time, small cotton farmers will have made a contribution to the national reduction in cotton acreage.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of January 10 regarding cotton legislation and acreage allotments.

The Department does not have available by counties data as to the additional cotton acreage that would be required or allotted under the present proposed legislation.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of January 7, 1950, requesting information regarding tobacco acreage allotments for 1942 and 1950 for all counties in the United States growing tobacco.

Marketing quotas were in effect in 1942 and are in effect for 1950 for flue-cured, burley, fire-cured, and dark air-cured tobacco. Quotas are in effect for Virginia sun-cured tobacco for 1950 for the first time. We are enclosing a tabulation by States and kinds of tobacco showing the total acreages allotted in 1940 through 1949.

The total tobacco acreages allotted in each State in 1950 will vary from those for 1949 by kinds of tobacco approximately by the following percentages: Flue-cured tobacco, increase 1 percent; burley tobacco, decrease 10 percent; and fire-cured and dark air-cured tobacco, decrease 13 percent. The total acreages allotted in each county are not available. However, it is hoped that the enclosed tabulation by States and kinds of tobacco will serve your need.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH S. TRIGG,
Administrator.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: As requested in your wire of January 12, I am attaching a listing sheet showing a distribution of the 1950 State cotton acreage allotment and the State committee reserve of 290,207 acres. The State committee reserve represents 3.8 percent of the total State allotment.

The State committee reserve was required to be used for (1) adjusting computed county allotments and upward trend in cotton planting, (2) abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings, (3) for assisting county committees with the establishment of fair and equitable allotments for farms whose indicated allotments were between 5 and 15 acres, (4) for assisting county committees with the making of 1950 new farm allotments, and (5) to assist county committees with the making of minimum farm allotments of not less than the smaller of 5 acres or the highest cotton history of the farm during the years 1946–48.

The adjustment in county allotment for abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings was the most difficult one since it required that consideration be given to (a) all types of weather conditions affecting cotton plantings in 1947 and 1948, (b) soil crusting in irrigated areas, (c) production of designated war crops instead of cotton in 1947, (d) disproportionate movement of farm operators and farm labor to off-farm employment as between counties, and (e) other minor abnormal conditions affecting one of more counties.

The State committee formula for use in distributing the State reserve is as follows:

1. Trend: For counties and administrative areas where the 1948 actual planted cotton acreage exceeds the 1947–48 average planted acreage by more than 10 percent, an allotment adjustment for such trend was computed as the product of (a) the increase in 1948 acreage over 1947 acreage and (b) 0.0904686.

2. Abnormal conditions: For counties and administrative areas where the 1947–48 average planted acreage is less than the 1941 planted acreage, an allotment adjustment for abnormal conditions of production affecting cotton plantings was computed as the product of (a) the decrease in planted acreage from 1941 to the 1947–48 average and (b) 0.0904686.

3. Five- to fifteen-acre allotment farms: For assisting county committees with the adjustment of allotments for 5- to 15-acre allotment farms, 50 percent of the amount of acreage used for this purpose under the 1942 allotment program (but not less than the smaller of 5 acres or the amount actually used under the 1942 program), except that an additional 1,204 acres was allocated to McLennan County, 859 acres to Hill County, and 214 acres to Coryell County above the amounts specified for use in determining fair and equitable allotments for such farms that will be comparable with allotments established for other similar farms in the communities in these three counties.

4. Group II: For assisting county committees with the establishment of group II (new grower) allotments in 1950, these amounts were allocated:

(a) For counties with official 1950 allotments of less than 1,000 acres, 25 acres, but not more than 25 percent of such official allotment.

(b) For counties with official allotments of 1,000 acres or more but less than 3,000 acres, 50 acres.

(c) For counties with official allotments of 3,000 acres or more but no more than 5,000 acres, 75 acres.

(d) 19,613 acres to certain counties in which substantial acreages of land in farms were devoted to cotton and other crops for the first time in 1949, on the basis of the amount of such cropland of record in the State office.

5. Small-farm increases: The remaining amount of such 3.8 percent State reserve to be added to the State reserve of 5,287 acres, which amounts of allotment are to be used for providing minimum acreage allotments for small farms in all counties.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

MATTER OF FACT

(By Joseph and Stewart Alsop)

TUNG NUTS AND HONEY

If you are a bit bemused by all the bellowing about the welfare state, it is a good idea to look into the present status of national farm policy. Here is where you can see how state economic planning may really work in America, simply because state planning has advanced further in this particular economic sector than in any other.

Because of Federal farm support prices, a very high proportion of all the major crops of this country now pass through the hands of a Government agency, the Commodity Credit Corporation. The CCC makes loans on, or purchases outright, everything from cotton and wheat to blue lupine seeds. It controls vast storage facilities, deals actively on the commodity exchanges, and offers farm products for exports. Secretary of Agriculture Brannan has just asked that the CCC's capital be increased by $2,000,000,000.

Nor does the Government stop at subsidizing the farmers under the cover of the CCC's highly philanthropic banking and trading operation. The Government is also empowered to exercise a considerable measure of control over the acreages of each crop that the farmers may plant.

The first thing you discover when you venture into this vital area of national policy, is that this is the happy hunting ground of special interests. Last year, for example, Secretary Brannan very nearly succeeded in getting an administration-approved farm bill through the Senate. At the last minute, however, he was defeated by his great enemies, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the previous Secretary of Agriculture, now the strongest man in the Senate Agriculture Committee, Senator CLINTON ANDERSON, of New Mexico.

How was this great defeat administered to Brannan? The answer is simple. The Brannan-approved bill did not offer support prices to tung nuts, honey, and pulled wool. The Senators from the honey, tung-nut and pulled-wool States were easily made to see how vital it was for these commodities to be subsidized by the taxpayer. Honey, tung nuts, and pulled wool went into Senator ANDERSON's bill. And Senator ANDERSON's bill passed instead of Secretary Brannan's.

Behind all the present clamor for and against the Brannan farm plan, the same sort of process operates on a much larger scale. The principles of the Brannan plan are very simple.

Instead of the present disguised subsidies, farmers are to be paid on open subsidies in the form of "production payments," whenever crop prices fall too low. Instead of being stored, or even destroyed, the subsidized farm products are to be sold on the open market for what they will bring, and eaten by the taxpayers. And because profits will thus be guaranteed to farmers, much more effective Government controls are to be imposed on acreages planted.

It is not the purpose here to say whether the Brannan plan is, or is not a good plan. What needs to be pointed out, rather, is the extreme hypocrisy that pervades the whole debate about this great issue.

The American Farm Bureau, for instance, bitterly denounces the plan as socialistic. But the Farm Bureau is led by Allan B. Kline, who was spotted for Secretary of Agriculture in the Dewey administration. The Farm Bureau is also controlled by large farmers. And one of the original Brannan plan's best features was a clause aimed at the present shocking situation, in which large farmers are given enormous annual presents by the American Treasury.

When the potato support-price mess was at its worst, for instance, more than one "farmer" in Aroostook County, Maine, was getting above $500,000 annually from the Government for his factory-farmed crop. Such "farmers" made profits of $250,000 a year or more. To end this nonsense, Brannan proposed to put a ceiling value of $25,000 on the crops that would be eligible for subsidy from any one farm. This was socialism, and aroused natural indignation.

The other really impelling objection to the Brannan plan is the increase of Government controls over farmers. But even the most conservative Republicans in Congress now accept the rule that our farmers must be guaranteed profits. If the farmers are to be guaranteed profits, but not controlled, the temptation will be irresistible to increase output until there is a hopeless glut of every crop, and the whole system collapses in chaos. In short, firm farm controls are the essential price of guaranteed farm profits. And if controls are to be honestly attacked, subsidies must be attacked, too.

From all this a conclusion perhaps arises. The real danger of state planning in the American society lies less in the fallibility of the planners, than in the power of special interests in the Congress, and in the widespread belief that you can have your cake and eat it, too.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF CENSUS,
Washington, January 6, 1950.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is to confirm answers to the questions you discussed yesterday with Mr. Ray Hurley, Chief, Agriculture Division of this Bureau.

According to the 1945 census there were 601,273 farms with 9 acres or less of cotton harvested. These farms with 9 acres or less of cotton harvested produced a total of 2,386,668 bales of cotton or an average of 3.97 bales per farm. If these farms were limited to a maximum production of 4 bales each, then the maximum total cotton production on such farms would be 2,405,092 bales. As we have pointed out, we do not know how many of these 601,273 farms produced more than 4 bales of cotton in 1944. If it could be assumed that there are now 1,500,000 farms producing cotton and that the same proportion of these 1,500,000 farms as in 1944 grew 9 acres or less of cotton, then 740,700 farms would have 9 acres or less of cotton. If each of these 740,700 farms were limited to a maximum production of 4 bales each, the maximum total production of such farms would be 2,962,800 bales.

According to the United States Department of Agriculture, approximately 32,200 farmers producing Irish potatoes were eligible for the price-support program in 1948. In 1944 there were 2,105,757 farmers producing Irish potatoes. The 32,200 farmers eligible for the price-support program is equivalent to 1.5 percent of all farmers harvesting potatoes in 1944. It should be noted that a large number of farmers producing potatoes grew them for use only on the farm. In 1944 only 432,923 farmers reported 1 acre or more of potatoes harvested.

Please let us know if we can be of further assistance.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP M. HAUSER,
Acting Director, Bureau of the Census.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the most constructive provision in the pending bill is the 40-percent provision that the gentleman from California seeks to strike. As has been observed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] and by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of the committee, there is nothing new about that 40-percent provision; that language was contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

When asked as to what this amendment would cost, the gentleman from California, not once but twice, declined to state, but finally said that it might cost $25,000,000. Permit me to say that I asked the Department what it would cost or how many acres would be added, and my opinion is that $25,000,000 is just the beginning, as the Department would not even give me a guess, much less an estimate.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee at this time as to whether or not the 40-percent provision of the pending bill involves the determination just as the determinations have been made by the Secretary of Agriculture under the act of 1938, as amended. I would like an answer for the information of the House.

Mr. COOLEY. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Agricultural surpluses hang like a pall over agriculture; they are a burden today to the Federal Treasury. During the year 1948 the amount of the advances by the Commodity Credit Corporation reached the staggering total of approximately $3,500,000,000. Just a few days ago the Secretary of Agriculture recommended to Congress that the authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation be increased by $2,000,000,000. Agriculture is profoundly interested in the preservation of the integrity of the laws under which, beginning with the act of 1938, the farmers have prospered. I know that inequities and injustices under the act of 1949 have developed. The purpose of this bill is to provide for a correction of these inequities and discriminations. Some say that the fault is with the county committees. Others say that the fault is with the State committees. Under the act, provision for reserved acres was made. The acres should have been reserved to correct inequities. However, the Department of Agriculture is not without blame. My understanding is that all adjudications by the county committees and by the State committees had to be approved by the Department of Agriculture. The Department and the committees must share the blame. I agree with the report of the Agriculture Committee that the mistakes were of administration; but no matter who made the mistakes, they should be corrected. These mistakes can be corrected by reducing the 70 percent to 60 percent and by eliminating the 50-percent provision of the bill. I would have favored an amendment as to the regulations, but the statement of the chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], and of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], as well as the undisputed intent of the House, makes such an amendment unnecessary.

No additional acres that are not absolutely essential to remove inequities and injustices should be added.

Those who advocate the 70-percent as well as those who advocate the 50-percent provision of the bill maintain that the 21,000,000-acre allotment was made and that the Department guessed that some one and one-half to two million acres would not be planted. This was one reason for the 21,000,000-acre limitation. The committee and the Congress knew that it was not contemplated that 21,000,000 acres would be planted. The addition of 1,402,000 acres would increase the acreage to be planted and that increase would be over the acreage that it was contemplated would be planted under the act of 1949.

I favor substituting 60 percent for 70 percent, because 60 percent, with slight differences, has obtained in the previous administration of the law. The 50 percent would result in inequities. It would favor the grower and the region where new lands have been taken in. The advocates of the 50 percent, under the guise of aiding the little man and the veteran, are in reality promoting the interests of the new lands that have been brought into cultivation. The average planted acres for the 3 years is fair. The selection of 1 year would be most unfair.

We have heard a lot about the little man and the big grower. Whenever you eliminate the 40 percent for the 40-acre man who grew cotton with the 40-acre provision in 1942, you eliminate it for the 4,000-acre owner who has gone into cotton in the last few years, whether the 4,000-acre owner lives in the lower Mississippi Valley or in the valleys of California. The average of 3 years rather than the 50-percent high of 1 year is fair and just to all whether the growers or acreage be large or small. The veteran believes in equality. The small owner believes in justice.

I advocate the substitution of 60 percent for 70 percent and the elimination of the 50-percent provision, because as best I can ascertain it will reduce the additional acreage from 1,402,000 to around 800,000 or 900,000 acres, and at the same time provide for the elimination of injustices. I want to remove inequities but I want to prevent surpluses. Such a program is for the general benefit of all cotton growers.

The committee, in 1949, after almost a year, reported and Congress finally passed a bill that I think is generally satisfactory. The mistakes in administration should be corrected. I believe that if the pending bill is amended as I have recommended additional acres will be provided that will amply correct the mistakes.

In speaking with respect to cotton, I have in mind the long-range program. Of course, a program for 1950 that is fair is important but, in view of there being no control since 1942, it is imperative that the existing surplus be increased no more than absolutely necessary on the one hand and, on the other hand, that these surpluses should be reduced as fast as possible. I repeat the act passed some months ago is generally fair. Errors have been made by the committee. The report of the committee admits that they were largely mistakes of administration. It is no answer as I have said, to say that the county committees and the State committees had discretion. Their allotments had been approved by the Department of Agriculture in Washington. The fault was either with the act or with both of these agencies, and probably both with the act and both of these agencies. The pending bill will increase the allotment by 1,402,000 acres. The farmers, when they voted for the program in December 1949, knew that the allotment was 21,000,000 acres.

As I have stated, the constructive feature of the pending bill is the 40-percent provision. I understand that the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture will be determined under the regulations that have heretofore been made in accordance with the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. The author of the pending bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], agrees with this interpretation. Otherwise, I would offer an amendment that the regulations must be in accord with the act of 1938, as amended.

I am in sympathy with the real purpose of the bill. I believe that injustices can be removed by substituting 60 percent for 70 percent and by eliminating the 50-percent provision in the bill.

The amendment to eliminate the 40 percent would defeat the very purpose of the pending bill. Neither the Department nor any responsible individual or organization has attempted to estimate how many additional acres would be added by the elimination of the provision. It was in the act of 1938 as amended. It is being interpreted now and will be interpreted in the future as provided by the act of 1938 as amended. The provision has been tried. It has been tested. The pending amendment should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, it is time to reiterate that this is a 1-year bill. It is a temporary bill. Also it cannot be clearly considered unless the admission is again pointed out that the difficulties we are in are administration failures. The fact is that a bill which was believed to be well drafted at the last session of the Congress has been interpreted to mean other things than the Congress intended in two outstanding examples; one, in regard to the war acreage which is a part of the Texas problem, and, second, the fact that the State cotton committees were not instructed as to their powers and what they should do.

It also should be pointed out that the admission has been made that if the bill as drafted had been made to function as intended practically all of the difficulties we are now in might have been alleviated.

The fact is, however, that when the cotton acreage went to the States, some of the committees, not being properly advised as to the powers of the State committees to withhold acreage, went ahead and allocated that acreage and determined the county factors. The acreage is out. It cannot be reallocated. I for one would like to see more acreage come down through the bill with proper instructions to the committees so that we can see just what is faulty with last year's bill at the end of this growing season. But we are not getting that opportunity in this legislation.

I am supporting this legislation and I am supporting the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr.

WHITE] for several reasons. It is a 1-year bill, necessitated by an administration failure. The bill concedes of the discovery of hardship cases at the local level. The county committees could have withheld 15 percent, and the State committees another 10 percent. In my State this means 166,000 acres, only 20,000 of them earmarked for any purpose, but all the rest of which could be used in the discretion of the committee at local level to aid hardship cases. If you think that is not beneficial to the little man you are wrong because there is where the protection was in the last bill. That is, for the little farmer through local committees.

In this bill, the limitation is already there for the 70 percent of the average of 1946, 1947, and 1948 or 50 percent of the largest growing of 1946, 1947, and 1948. Then the 40-percent provision is in there which to me just cements into the law for another 1 year the failure of the county and State committees to withhold enough acreage which would have brought the county factors down and would have left in my State of California 166,000 acres to help the small growers. But when you pass this bill the small grower will still be in the same position. He cannot get above 40 percent by reason of the difficulties created by the failure of administration, and as long as it is an administration failure, then it seems to me we should admit that here. We should take care of the people who have been hurt by that failure and who are now forbidden by law to plant cotton.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WERDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not a fact that if this amendment does not prevail, it will limit the 40-percent factor in all of the counties which are now under 40 percent, and those counties with more than 40 percent throughout the country will have more than 40 percent of their total cropland, but yet the further inequity will prevail reducing the other counties below the 40-percent factor?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the necessary number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] if he will assist me in analyzing the statement that I have prepared and shown here on the chart. Over the week end I advised with a widow lady in my county of Richmond, N. C., on her cotton acreage allotment.

On this board you will see that she grew in 1946, 1947, and 1948, 225 acres of cotton each year; 60 acres of wheat each year; 50 acres of corn each year, and 15 acres of other crops each year; or a total of 350 acres of cropland cut out of a total acreage of 366. She has been allotted only 80 acres of cotton for 1950. On this farm are located 10 families employing 35 tenants. On the basis of this present cut she has notified five of those families that they would have to leave, or an equivalent of half of the tenant population.

My good friend, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. GRANGER], stated some moments ago that there was no suffering going on. I wish to point out to the gentleman that these serious inequities, as represented in this actual case represent much present suffering. These displaced tenants are even now coming to our county welfare offices and the State and the Federal Government must and they even now are taking care of many of these displaced tenants.

I asked the lady represented by the illustration how much additional cotton acreage she would need in order to maintain all of these families on this farm. She said she could get by if she was awarded 125 acres.

Now I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] to tell me, on the basis of this illustration, just how much acreage of cotton she would be allowed under the pending resolution.

Mr. PACE. Under the pending resolution the farm would receive an allotment of 140 acres, which would be 40 percent of her total tilled land of 350 acres.

You understand that this lady's home county has already received its fair portion of the national allotment, and the committee is building that up, and the committee bill simply says that when you increase it to 70 percent, we will not increase it beyond 40 percent of the cropland.

Mr. DEANE. I wish to thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I support the pending resolution, since based upon this lady's actual statement, and I feel it is representative of most growers. She could protect her tenant population and give them full employment if she is awarded 125 acres. I repeat, I feel that the actual case history is characteristic of most of the farms where large numbers of tenants are being displaced.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the gentleman this question? Under the formula that he has explained here to the House, how much has she been allocated for 1950 under the present act?

Mr. DEANE. She has been allocated 80 acres.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WHITE of California. Suppose the lady had only 40 acres which she had been planting, all in cotton, does not the gentleman realize that under the 40-percent limitation she could not plant but 16 acres?

Mr. DEANE. In answer to the gentleman, there is a growing feeling on the part of those of us interested in the southern cotton grower that he must diversify on a larger scale. But I return to the subject of these displaced tenants. These particular families have been growing cotton in this community for 40 years, at least the greater number of them. They are completely displaced. They are not familiar with any other occupation. As we think in terms of displaced persons from Europe, we must not overlook the growing number of displaced persons in this country. I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that for every 100 acres of cotton crop land that is removed from production at least 25 people are going to be without employment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the gentleman's argument boil down to this, that he is asking the Federal Government to take over a relief activity which should be the responsibility of the community concerned?

Mr. DEANE. No, I do not agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. The gentleman has made some very fine remarks and has been very helpful to those of us who are not from the Cotton Belt. I particularly commend the gentleman from North Carolina for pointing out that this is a human problem, that people will be unemployed and will have to go on relief unless this bill is passed. Would not the gentleman say in response to the gentleman from New York that this is not a relief question? If we pass this bill and it is properly administered, we will keep people from going on relief.

Mr. DEANE. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. CARROLL. May I commend further the gentleman from North Carolina, whose votes have always been on the side of human beings. It would seem to me, when those people who come from the Cotton Belt can now see this real problem that confronts them, can they not see these other problems that confront human beings in other areas of the country? It would seem to me that this ought to open their minds more than any one measure to the fact that if we do not give this relief there are no industries to which these people can go. Therefore, they will go on relief. They should have some concern for the other industrial areas of this Nation, instead of voting as they do on many important issues.

Mr. DEANE. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. In answer to the gentleman from New York, is it not a fact that this situation has been the result of a Federal law, and a Federal law ought to change it? These people should not be thrown by Federal act onto the mercy of the local communities.

Mr. DEANE. The gentleman is correct. I think this will be found. As you study a great many of the cotton growers, the individuals who are growing 200 to 300 acres of cotton, you find they are going to make every possible effort to maintain the tenant population. I know I have talked with several outstanding farmers, and in many cases they indicate that regardless of the cut they would try in some way to maintain their tenants' employment. I do not agree with the philosophy of the gentleman from New York who made the statement a moment ago, because we are either going to help them in their employment by recognizing the need for this adjustment in acreage or we are going to pay for it through charity and our welfare programs.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Does the gentleman happen to know how many additional acres of cotton will be provided this county? What is the county?

Mr. DEANE. I do not have the figures. All I can say is I trust the House will adopt this resolution promptly, because the longer we debate it the more serious will become the problem because our cotton farmers must prepare their land and make plans for the approaching season.

Mr. BECKWORTH. What county is this?

Mr. DEANE. My county is Richmond.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEANE. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the person he has in mind would be satisfied with a 125-acre allotment?

Mr. DEANE. She stated if she was awarded an allotment of 125 acres she could maintain her entire tenant population. I talked also with the manager of her farm and he confirmed this position.

Mr. COOLEY. Under the resolution as now drawn with this provision in it she will get an allotment, not of 125 acres, but of 140 acres?

Mr. DEANE. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there has been some talk about people not planting the entire acreage that they will be given this year. But do not fool yourselves on that score because cotton will be their most profitable crop which they can plant in 1950 under the 90-percent support program and the 22,400,000 acres will be authorized if this bill passes, together with the allocation made under last year's act will all be planted to cotton. When the Department of Agriculture or someone on our committee says that they will only plant nineteen or twenty million acres, why, they are just fooling themselves. This lady, whose case we saw illustrated, said that she would be satisfied with 125 acres. She had 225 acres last year and if she is given 140 acres you can be sure that she will plant the entire 140 so that she will have more work for her tenants and profit for herself.

There is another point that has been brought out here, and that is that this would only cost the Government, if it cost anything, $75,000,000. The cotton production in 1948 was 312.5 pounds per acre. Last year it was 285.8 pounds per acre. I recognize the fact that the 10-year average was 254 pounds to the acre. But if we have comparable weather this year, and I am satisfied that with the additional fertilizer they are putting on the land we can probably get the average of 1948 and 1949, which would be about 300 pounds to the acre, it would cost the Treasury about $120,000,000 if the Government is forced to buy all of this cotton.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. PACE. I am sure the gentleman does not want to leave that statement stand in the RECORD. It does not necessarily mean that the Government will lose $120,000,000 if it makes a loan on that much cotton, does it? We know that the Government made a profit of $200,000,000 on its loan cotton.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Of course, we might have a crop failure, too, and it might be a blessing to have this amount of cotton on hand. But the gentleman knows eventually you have to get rid of the cotton. You can keep it for a number of years, but you have to get rid of it and the only way we are getting rid of about 3,000,000 or 3,500,000 bales of cotton a year is through the ECA. The ECA gets its money from the taxpayers of the country. That is why it can be said that the Commodity Credit Corporation shows a profit. Is not that correct?

Mr. PACE. The Commodity Credit Corporation certainly cannot take the losses of the ECA expenditures. Nobody expects that.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No, but the ECA gets its money from the taxpayers through the Treasury. ECA buys cotton from the Commodity Credit Corporation and then gives it away to other countries. When that program comes to an end, when no money is appropriated for ECA to buy this cotton, then the gentleman will admit we will have a real problem in this country.

Mr. PACE. Then the cotton and wheat growers and all the other farmers of this Nation are going to be in trouble; yes, sir.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is right and that is the problem we have to face.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly the gentleman does not object to the ECA money being spent for cotton and other agricultural commodities, does he?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No; I want that money spent for cotton and tobacco and other commodities produced in this country rather than to have the money appropriated and given to England and some of these other countries to buy cotton, cheese, wheat, and bacon and other products in other parts of the world outside of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about the dairy situation, in view of what my good colleague, the gentleman from Kansas, said.

There is no restriction on the production of milk, but there is a restriction upon the marketing of milk and dairy products throughout the United States. We are producing too much milk in the Middle West. That milk must go into cheese and butter. Limitations have been placed upon the marketing of milk and cream in the United States. In the first place, Congress put through the milk marketing agreement and orders, back in 1937, which built up trade barriers between sections of the country. That action stopped the surplus-producing areas of milk from shipping milk and cream into those areas where we have the heavy consumption.

The other restraint is this oleo legislation which is gradually taking away the butter market from dairy farmers, and after June 30, 60,000,000 pounds of butter will be imported under a duty of 7 cents per pound. These three acts on the part of the Roosevelt and Truman administrations will rapidly liquidate the great dairy industry of the Midwest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] has expired.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is a pro forma amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARRIS. Have we voted on the amendment offered by the gentleman? I have been here right along and I did not think we had.

The CHAIRMAN. It is still pending. This is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, dealing with the situation in regard to the cropland approach to farm cotton allotments, as compared with the historical approach, I want to read an excerpt from a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, which was written within the last few days. It deals very pointedly with that subject. I am quoting from the letter:

> The difficulties encountered by the use of the cropland as a primary basis in establishing farm cotton acreage allotments were clearly written in the history of the legislation and the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. When the act was first enacted in February of 1938, no provision was included for establishing minimum cotton acreage allotments for farms except for some of the smaller ones. Regulations and instructions were prepared for the administration of the original provisions of the act and were applied in some counties. Immediately, it was noted that the same type of inequities about which many complaints are now being heard with respect to Public Law 272 likewise resulted when the original provisions of the act of 1938 were applied in these counties.

Now, if that is not a condemnation of the cropland procedure, I do not know what it is.

He says further:

Basic legislation should be revised to apportion county cotton allotments to farms primarily on the basis of recent cotton acreage history.

Now that is certainly a repudiation of the 40 percent limitation which my amendment seeks to strike out.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Of course, the gentleman knows that he and I must sooner or later face that situation in the committee. You get your State allotment on history and you get your county allotment on history.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is all right for permanent legislation, but this is temporary legislation.

Mr. PACE. How does it strike the gentleman to let it stay like it is and then let each county and each State determine whether the allocation shall be by cropland or by history?

Mr. WHITE of California. Well, we could discuss that at the time, but at the moment I think this should be stricken out of this temporary legislation, because, after all, we are dealing with complaints from farmers all over the Nation. We told them that this 40 percent would not be in there and yet it was put in. It is a fraud on the farmers.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Who told them that it would not be in there?

Mr. WHITE of California. The committee issued a press release in which the provisions of the relief were clearly outlined. It was done for the express purpose of informing those farmers just what the situation would be.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman made the statement that the gentlemen's committee has told the farmers that the 40 percent provision would not be in the bill. The gentleman knows that I made no such statement. The gentleman knows that I introduced the bill in exactly the same form it was——

Mr. WHITE of California. I am not criticizing the gentleman from North Carolina. He has acted in good faith all the way through. I did not mean any reflection on him.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. How much additional acreage will the knocking out of this 40-percent provision give the State of California? Has the gentleman got those figures?

Mr. WHITE of California. No; I am sorry I have not got them. But I know of several cases that are directly affected, and they are little people. I have complaints; in fact, I have a petition on it over in my office.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman said that the Government perpetrated a fraud in this matter. Will the gentleman say who in the Government perpetrated the fraud?

Mr. WHITE of California. I did not say that the Government had perpetrated a fraud; I said that it would be a fraud if we left this provision in the legislation, and I have moved to strike it out. I therefore ask all the Members to support my amendment to keep from perpetrating a fraud upon the farmers of the Nation.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. GATHINGS. I want to commend the gentleman for introducing this amendment. This provision ought to be stricken out. As a matter of fact, a press release was issued and it was sent out to the American cotton farmers and showed exactly what would be provided.

Mr. WHITE of California. The gentleman is absolutely right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE], a member of the committee, would strike out the proviso in the resolution limiting all farms to 40 percent of the total tillable cropland on the farm, notwithstanding the previous provision assuring that no farm shall be reduced less than the larger of 70 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted on the farm 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted in any one of three such years.

I am supporting the amendment. I believe it is fair; I believe it is right; I believe it to be more equitable. I say this because I think that if we are going to have the cropland approach to this problem it is inequitable for one county to have 47 percent of its total tillable cropland production in cotton and other counties to have but 40 percent. It just is not right for one county in my State, Mississippi, as represented by my distinguished, lovable, and able colleague, from Arkansas [Mr. GATHINGS], a member of this distinguished committee, to have 47 percent of its cropland and for Union and many other counties throughout the United States with less than 40 percent to be limited to 40 percent; but that is what is being attempted.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. GATHINGS. I agree with the gentleman wholeheartedly that if one county in the Cotton Belt gets 47 percent that all counties should, that neither Union County nor any other county should be damaged by being forced to take but 40 percent.

Mr. HARRIS. If this provision remains in the bill it penalizes the county with the low factor in favor of the county with a high factor. I regret to be forced to disagree with the distinguished gentleman whose work I appreciate very much, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY]. But I honestly believe he is wrong. This is a Farm Bureau amendment and continues inequities instead of correcting them as they should be.

Mr. Chairman, I think one thing that has brought this matter back to us at this time is that we have not understood generally how it actually worked when applied to the individual farm. The broad policy appears to be all right for the proper acreage reduction. We understood it on a national basis, on the State level, and its application to the county, but when it got to the individual farms the trouble started; there is where we failed to understand its application. I think for the record and information we should know now just how this is going to work and how it will be administered. I talked to Mr. Woolley about it with a view of learning how this law would be administered, and I shall be glad to include in the RECORD, following these remarks, a letter which I received from him advising just how it would be administered if passed as it is now before us reported by the committee.

Let me carry this just a little farther, using the example stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE], as he has outlined here on this chart. Mrs. A has a total cropland production of 350 acres. I do not know what her factor is, but it gives her 80 acres allocation to cotton for 1950.

If this resolution were to be adopted, it is my understanding, and this letter from the Department of Agriculture bears out my statement, that the present listings will be used. The farmer will be notified what his present listing is. If he has 100 acres he will be notified of that 100 acres allotment and the 70 or 40 percent, if this is maintained, limitation. The farmer will be notified as to what his crop will be under the present listing, applying the 70–40 percent, as this resolution provides. He will also be notified at the same time that if he is satisfied that will be the end of it. That is his allotment.

If he is not satisfied he may come to the county office and file in writing an appeal with the county committee within 15 days. The county committee will refer it to a review board, which board will be from outside and come into that county for the purpose of hearing his case. Then the review board will say to Mrs. A.: "You have shown here that you are entitled to more than 80 acres. If that can be shown, we will give you 70 percent of your average planting for 1946, 1947, 1948 or 50 percent of any one of such years whichever is the larger is it is not more than 40 percent of the total cropland." This will be an independent board before whom the farmer can go and show and prove that he is entitled to have.

The additional question comes up as to whether or not the reported acres of the farmer will be used or the adjusted BAE acres will be used. Under this review or request for review, if she can show the BAE figures are not correct, the review board will correct her allotment accordingly and give her what the resolution says, the larger of 70 percent of the actual planting of the years 1947, 1948, and 1949 or 50 percent of any one of these years if within the 40 percent limitation of total cropland.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1950.

Hon. OREN HARRIS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HARRIS: This will confirm our conversation Friday afternoon about the plan the Department of Agriculture intends to follow in carrying out that part of House Joint Resolution 398, provided it becomes law, with respect to notifying farmers of their new allotments.

It is our intention to use the present data on the listing sheets as to the average production of cotton for the 3 years, 1946, 1947, and 1948, or regarded as planted to cotton, and derive what 70 percent this figure would be. From the same source we would determine what 50 percent of the highest planted or regarded as planted would be for one of those three years. This information would then be included in the notice to all producers whose allotments would be raised thereby with further information that if they were dissatisfied with their base, they could likewise appeal this information. The appeal would be to a review committee composed of farmers outside the county in which their farm is located. The notice would indicate that to obtain the additional allotment it would be necessary to file an application at the county office with a certification of intention to plant the additional acreage. All other producers who had received an allotment in excess of 70 percent of the average of the 3 years, 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 50 percent of the highest planted in one of these years would not be given any special notice. However, each county committee would be instructed to publicize the fact that the law permitted an appeal from the base acreage and indicate the procedure that should be followed in filing the appeal.

It is my understanding that the foregoing is in accordance with the desires of the House Agriculture Committee.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK K. WOOLLEY,
Deputy Administrator.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let it be known that the committee as such is not supporting this amendment. It is true that some members of the committee did meet in Washington in December and without having an opportunity to go into all of the details suggested that they wanted to give to the farmers certain relief which this bill carries. These members did not tell the farmers of the United States that they had at that time written in all of the details of the legislation. They simply outlined the type of relief that they would attempt to secure.

When we considered the entire matter we found we were getting into some rather deep water. As I said a while ago, the purpose of cotton allotments and all other allotments is to protect the taxpayers, not to protect the cotton farmer, but to protect the United States Treasury from having to pay out too much money.

We have been rather liberal, in my opinion, in the bill we have brought before you. We have sought to take care of all of the real hardship cases. There will be some we cannot take care of. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], has described some. I do not know how you can take care of those in this emergency legislation. It is not however necessary to give a man a cotton allotment on 70 percent of all the land each farmer owns in order to take care of hardship cases.

Let me give you a personal illustration. In 1934 we had this kind of provision in the law. That is, we had no limitation. In 1934 I was farming a section of land in Texas. Adjoining me was a section of land which was as identical to mine as two pieces of land could be. Since 1929 I had been growing about 200 acres of cotton, about 200 acres of wheat and about 200 acres of feed, being the most reasonable rotation I knew on that kind of land. The neighbor who owned the section adjoining me had been planting 600 or more acres in cotton every year. When they gave out allotments they gave him 300 acres of cotton and they gave me 102 acres. I did not feel it was fair then, I do not feel it is fair today. The men who created this cotton problem in 1934 and the men who created it in 1949 were the men who were planting cotton to their doorsteps. They were the men who brought cotton "history" to their counties, it is true, but it is equally true that they were and are the men who brought a cotton surplus to our country and who brought cotton acreage control to their neighbors. I cannot agree that such planters should be rewarded for bringing about the conditions which imperil every cotton farmer in the country and which impose a burden on every taxpayer, and yet the man who has planted a very large part of his land in cotton in the past is the only man who could benefit by this amendment.

The man who was planting all of his land in cotton—he is the man who created the cotton problem. It was not the little farmer who was planting only a portion of his land in cotton; it was not the big farmer who was diversifying and rotating his crops who caused this surplus. It was the cotton hog. I am not going to pin any medals on his breast.

The gentleman from California now comes before us representing a district of the largest cotton farms in the United States. He asks us to give those people the right to plant 70 percent of their entire acreage provided only that they have in the past planted all their acreage in cotton and saying that it would be unfair to cut them down to 40 percent of their total acreage. The gentleman suggested that we must give them the right to plant 70 percent.

Now, in the name of all that is sound, is that fair to the taxpayer? Is that fair to the farmer who has diversified his crop? Is that good farming practice? Can any man say that when you have to follow cotton with cotton, to plant your allotment, that you are following sound farming practices? I submit that sound cotton farming in California, Texas or Arkansas would suggest that a man not plant cotton on the same land more than once in about every three years, and that he plant something else in the meantime. Now, if we are going to try to care for the man who has followed the practices that our Department of Agriculture has suggested, and who has sought to institute a sound and balanced farming program, then let us give the acreage to the man who is really suffering and not give it to the man who has been planting all of his land in cotton over a long period of years.

Let us, my friends, give consideration to whether the man has followed sound farming practices. Can you justify using Government money to support a program of unsound farming practices? Can you justify a program of using Government money to plant 70 percent of any man's land, in cotton? I do not think you can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. May I inquire of the Chairman when the Republicans will be heard on the subject of cotton?

The CHAIRMAN. Any time that the members of the committee do not seek recognition and the gentleman does.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas would have you think that there was a difference between a man that farms a big farm, using tenants on his farm, and a man who lives on his farm and owns 20 acres of land. There is no difference under the shining sun whether a man owns 2,000 acres of farm land and has 10, 15, or 20 families on his farm or whether that man owns a farm consisting of 40 acres. A tenant family farms just like a man who owns his own land. Just because he is a sharecropper or tenant he deserves the same treatment.

The gentleman from Texas is a fine man, an excellent and learned legislator. I am amazed at his argument. I have never heard the gentleman from Texas do a thing like that, or make a demagogic statement.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GATHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TACKETT. I will ask the gentleman, knowing the State of Arkansas as he does, suppose in the Delta area they have been planting cotton, as they have for the last 100 years, and built up a wonderful history, and suppose in western Arkansas where I live, that one farm has been planting cotton for 100 years, a farm consisting of 2,000 acres, is there any more reason why that man over in western Arkansas should not receive 70 percent, or at least as much, based on the history of that farm, as the man who lives in the Delta area?

Mr. GATHINGS. Let me answer the gentleman.

Mr. TACKETT. One more thing.

Mr. GATHINGS. Just a moment now. The gentleman will have plenty of time. There will be no difference under the hardship cases of any county. The bill would take no acreage away, however it is intended to help those who are trimmed drastically in all counties the same way.

Mr. TACKETT. I will have to do it now, because I may never get the floor again.

Mr. GATHINGS. There is no difference whatever. As a matter of fact if you come from Pike County, as the gentleman does from the adjoining county of Howard, you will get the same percentage as they do in any other county. You get that now. It is a question of administration of the act solely and exclusively. We grow cotton in eastern Arkansas in a big way, that is true.

Mr. TACKETT. In eastern Arkansas you will get 40 per cent and over in western Arkansas, unless the amendment offered by the gentleman from California is adopted, my farmer of 2,000 acres is not going to get 40 per cent. I want to be sure that the farmers in my area are accorded the same treatment as those in any other section of the country.

Mr. GATHINGS. This bill seeks to do equity to all counties throughout the cotton growing States, but the farmer must apply in writing to his county committee stating that he had received an inequitable allotment.

Let me say here and now that cotton trends ought to be considered in any legislation this Congress passes. In one county in the southwestern section of Arkansas a county agent said, "I hope to the Lord that I live to see the day that there is not an acre of cotton ever planted in this county, because the farmers can make more money out of something else." They had gone out of cotton. The trend has gone over to where, the land being fertile and rich down in the delta, there is a type of staple grown that the trade demands. You do not go into the loan as on this cheap grade of cotton raised in the hills, you get a buyer for your product.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GATHINGS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. I should like to correct the statement of the gentleman from Texas that California has 35,000-acre cotton farms. There is a corporate farm out there that has 35,000 acres, but it has only 10,000 acres in cotton. Under this bill, with the 40-percent minimum knocked out, as I propose in my amendment, they could plant but 70 percent of their cotton, and it would be 7,000 acres, which would be one-fifth of their total land. They have hundreds of families on those farms. I hold no brief for the big farmers, I am talking about the 40-acre fellow. It would cut his throat, figuratively speaking. He could plant but 16 acres.

Mr. GATHINGS. The 40-percent provision should not have been incorporated in this bill, it is detrimental to all sizes of farms. I fought this 40-percent proposal in the committee and I am fighting it now.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GATHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKETT. The gentleman made reference a moment ago, purely inadvertently, to something about demagoguery. Will not the gentleman correct that before he leaves the floor?

Mr. GATHINGS. I will say I have never heard the gentleman from Texas ever make a demagogic statement. That is what I said. I would not think that any man would object to a person marrying any woman he desired, even if she weighed 300 pounds. That is a privilege we have in America. We cannot and should not attempt to regulate the size of his farm or the size of his home, or his business. That is why our forefathers came to America. We are entitled to freedom of choice and freedom of opportunity as well as any other right accorded a free people. Let us preserve those heritages.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the slogan I have taken for the year is "Be nifty and thrifty in fifty." If we do that, how are you going to pay all these subsidies? Think it over.

That is not the question that is so much in my mind right now, as to paying all these subsidies to the cotton farmers, as it is a letter I got this morning that might be interesting to all you cotton-farmer Congressmen. It is a resolution from the Pennsylvania Society of Arizona. I never heard of it before today. It reads as follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the State of Arizona faces a grave emergency because of lack of water which threatens to undermine the State's economy by forcing out of production one-third of the State's agricultural lands; and

Whereas to overcome this threat, the only remaining source from which supplemental water is available is from Arizona's share of water from the Colorado River; and

Whereas legislation has been introduced in the Congress of the United States, now designated as S. 75 and H. R. 934 and H. R. 935, the passage of which will preserve, without reduction, our present acreage and provide a needed supply of hydroelectric energy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Pennsylvania Society of Arizona (representing over 500 former Pennsylvanians now residing in or adjacent to Phoenix, Ariz.), this 12th day of January 1950 at Phoenix, Ariz., That we wholeheartedly endorse the above-designated legislation and exhort the people of Arizona to continue their unified efforts until success is assured; now, be it further

Resolved, That the Pennsylvania Society of Arizona urges the congressional delegation from Pennsylvania to act favorably on the above legislation when it comes before them for a vote and that a copy of this resolution be sent to each and every Member of the Pennsylvania delegation in the Congress of the United States.

PENNSYLVANIA SOCIETY OF ARIZONA,
CLYDE J. COATES, President.
PATAICIA BENTZ, Secretary.

I never knew there was a Pennsylvania Society of Arizona. They say it represents about 500 people in the State. I wonder what percent of the population that is in Arizona?

The bills referred to in the resolution seek to do just the opposite of what you are trying to do now. You are trying to take land out of cultivation. They want to build a dam on the Colorado River that will put into cultivation a great many thousand acres. It may be well for Arizona to put this land into cultivation, but it will cost from one and a quarter to one and a half billion dollars, a tremendous sum of money. Where will you get such big money? I got the information in reference to this bill after I saw what was coming here from the Pennsylvania Society of Arizona. That disturbed me, so I inquired. It is going to cost $1,250,000 to $1,500,000 to construct that dam. After you construct that dam, the ground which it would put into cultivation will cost you $1,600 an acre. Now, get that—$1,600 an acre. After you get the land in cultivation then the land will be worth about $200 an acre. If that is not a good way to make money for Arizona, then I do not know anything. A terrible thing to do considering the country. But here is the sad part about it. When you have Members of Congress of both bodies with the predicament that our country is in today advocating the construction of such new projects as this, there is something wrong in Denmark and something wrong with the men who are advocating it. They know our country today is in the red $256,000,000,000. I am sorry the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] is not in the Chamber at the moment, because I wish he were here. He was here earlier, but is not on the floor at the present time. But think of it. It is going to cost $1,250,000,000 to put the land under cultivation, which will then cost you $1,600 an acre, and after you get the land it will be worth $200 an acre. Is not that asinine? It will be more cotton land to subsidize. Terrible!

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. POULSON. And they are going to raise cotton on that land?

Mr. RICH. Yes; that is why it is of such interest to the cotton boys. And that is the reason why it is in the interest of the cotton boys to help me and you kill the bill before it is made a law. I am trying to nip it in the bud. I am going to nip every proposition in the bud that I can on the floor of the House that is as wrong as this bill is at this time. The thing that gets me is that the Pennsylvania Society of Arizona wants the Pennsylvania Congressman to vote for it. I am telling you right now I do not propose to vote for it. I am going to fight it all I can.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from California, to whom I might say, it is going to take water away from you, too.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Yes; I know. The gentleman has not heard from the Pennsylvania Society in California. When he hears from them they will not be raising cotton on that land, but they will be raising a lot of hell in California.

Mr. RICH. I hope they win in California.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania always wants to know where we are going to get the money. It is a good question. But in this instance the gentleman wants to know whether we are going to be repaid. The $1,250,000,000 which will be spent to make land cultivable which will be worth $200 an acre will also produce public power which will in time repay this money.

Mr. RICH. Do you need the power down there now? Do you need the acreage down there now? I say "No; a thousand times no." You cotton farmers want more acreage in Arizona now to raise cotton and put the people in Texas out of the cotton business and put the people in Alabama out of the cotton business and the people in Tennessee, yes, and Oklahoma, too, out of the cotton business. You have asked us to subsidize you now, so you cotton Congressmen should not spend this money to increase cotton acreage when you want to take cotton land out of cultivation. It does not make sense; it is not sound. Be nifty and thrifty in fifty.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I probably will not take the full 5 minutes. I just rise to ask two questions, which I realize are indications of support of this amendment. I am not absolutely certain I am going to vote for it, but I think I will.

In the first place whether a direct promise was made or not, if an implied promise was made to the farmers before they voted that there should not be any 40 percent limitation in this resolution, would that not be in the nature, as the gentleman from Texas just suggested offhand of a contract? Why should we violate that? If we want to put that limitation in, let us put it in later, but not now. Let us advise the farmers that we are going to do it before doing it and give them a chance to pass on it. After asking that question, is this not a sound and correct approach? It is sound and logical to assume that every business in our fine society more or less establishes a custom and practice over a period of years and evidently the cotton industry has established a practice both on the part of the little fellows and the big fellows, of planting about what would be within the economy of that particular area or that particular section of the country. Now we are cutting them down to 70 percent, in the first instance, of what they established as good practice. Why complicate it and put more gadgets in? Why not leave it at 70 percent? They ought to have 100 percent, but it seems we cannot if we are to have controlled prices. But why not let them have 70 percent? Why put in something else?

Now, I think there is no man in this House who has worked any harder than I have since I have been here—I have been here only 3 years it is true, but I have worked night and day since being here for what I believe is for the interest of the common man. I have not sent out a speech since I have been here; not one. Of course I may some time but as I see it now I do not intend to send one out. Also, I suppose there will be no notation made in the press of what I am saying. So I am not speaking for the press nor publication of any kind. But let me say this, that while I have been for what I believe is for the interest of the common man, I want to ask what is wrong with being fair with the big man? You cannot substitute anything for fairness. You say this may be helpful to the big man. Suppose it is. Should we not be fair with him? There is nothing wrong with that. You cannot properly substitute for fairness on any occasion. I say to you that unless we are fair we will lose the respect of our people.

Then just this thought and I conclude: In addition to the two questions I have raised what I am afraid of is that there will be thousands of our farmers—not just a few, but thousands of the fellows who are just barely able to stay on the farm, who will be discriminated against by this 40-percent limitation of the tilled annual acreage provision.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman mentioned 70 percent; just give him 70 percent. Is it not a fact that the national average reduction was estimated to be 20 percent or about 22 percent?

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, sir. It was estimated, as I understand it, that the average reduction would be 22 percent. We have reduced him 30 percent, and then you come along with another gadget and reduce him some more. You complicate it. Why complicate it? Why not make it a simple reduction of 30 percent?

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. This 23 percent reduction is over the 1949 acreage. Actually there is a smaller reduction over the 1946, 1947, and 1948 average.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, I believe that is correct. I do not believe this cotton program is going to cost Uncle Sam one thin dime. You cannot take the history of the cotton program and say there is any reasonable expectation that it is going to cost Uncle Sam anything.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRIS. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. I have doubt that it will cost anything, but the gentleman understands it is six of one and a half dozen of the other; that the more we add on now, the greater the cut will be next year and the year after that. That is to say, under the permanent law, under the formula, the more cotton that is produced now the further down he must cut it next year and the next year.

Mr. MORRIS. That of course is true. But should not we wait until we notify them before we cut?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORRIS] has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. For the sake of clarification, I want to ask a couple of questions. The intricacies of this cotton legislation are a little difficult for some of us to understand. I know the Members want to be helpful. There seems to be a pretty general idea that the cost of this bill, if enacted, will be somewhere around $150,000,000. The answer was made to me by the gentleman from Utah, when I put the question, that it might be three-quarters of a billion dollars, but I believe that the consensus is that it would be $150,000,000. If we enact this amendment offered by the gentleman from California, I assume that will increase that figure somewhere around $25,000,000.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will be glad to yield, if I am wrong or if you will clarify it.

Mr. SUTTON. According to the Department of Agriculture, provided the Government buys all this cotton, that will be $90,000,000 to $120,000,000—if the Government takes it all over.

Mr. KEATING. I am correct, am I not, in saying that even without the enactment of this law, the Government is going to have about 8,000,000 bales of cotton on hand? Is not that correct?

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. The figures given by the gentleman from Tennessee, it should be understood, represent the amount of money which the Government will have invested in cotton; it is not necessarily a loss.

Mr. KEATING. No; but they will have the cotton on hand; the Government will have it.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is right, but there has never been any loss in the cotton program from the time of its inception to the present; in fact, there has been a $200,000,000 profit.

Mr. KEATING. That is by shipping a lot of the cotton overseas; that is a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. WHITE of California. I wish the gentleman would tell me just what we would have done in World War II without the 11,000,000 bales of cotton we had on hand.

Mr. KEATING. I am not questioning that; the gentleman apparently does not understand the point I am making. I am trying to clarify some of the matters which, in my judgment, should have been in the report. This report is singularly silent about the cost of this measure and I would like to get a few of these matters cleared up.

In addition to cotton, we have here an item which has not been discussed at all; peanuts. I see that peanuts are in for a little ride in this bill. Can some member of the committee tell me how much the enactment of section 5 of this bill relating to peanuts is going to take out of the pockets of the taxpayers and the wage earners of this country?

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. My recollection is that the estimate is $3,500,000. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] can probably give the gentleman more accurate information than I on the subject of peanuts; but it is something in the neighborhood of 2 or 3 million dollars; and that is not any loss to the taxpayers and to the workers of this country, as pointed out a moment ago by the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE]. It is difficult for me to understand all this excitement about losses. Certainly, there are some potential losses involved, but cotton is still good collateral. We now have on hand a supply that is less than the average for 7 out of the last 10 years; so it is not a gift or gratuity that is being handed to the cotton farmers; it is not a bounty, because we contend that cotton is now worth $150 a bale, and hereafter will always be worth $150 a bale. If we sustain the price, cotton will not sustain a loss.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman's program boils down to this; that the cotton subsidy and the peanut subsidy that are in this bill will not result in any eventual loss to the Government provided the price of cotton and peanuts stays up; but if the production of these products, stimulated by such measures as this, is increased to the point where the price does not stay up, then the taxpayers and the wage earners of this country have got to pay any loss entailed by the overproduction of cotton and peanuts.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. PACE. In order that the gentleman may fully understand the situation, let me state that during the war the peanut acreage was built up to 3,300,000 acres. Last year under the quota program that was cut to 2,650,000; this year it has been cut to 2,100,000. Our acreage has already been cut from 3.3 to 2.1 but this cut involved an inequity in area between Alabama and Texas, and this provision is to correct that situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCORMACK. As I understand, the pending amendment is the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. Can the Chair advise us how many other amendments are pending?

The CHAIRMAN. Only eighteen.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TACKETT].

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, I realize that there are a lot of amendments pending and a lot of Members wish to be heard on this particular amendment, but I do not know of a section that is more interested in the cotton allotment matter than the Fourth Congressional District of Arkansas which I have the honor to represent. I think it is important that I give you some idea of the feelings of my people concerning the issue covered by this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, is it fair that a man who has a farm with a cotton history of 100 years not be given the same rights as the man with a cotton history of a similar number of years in some other section of the same State? It cannot be anything but fair that my neighbor over there in my congressional district be given, based upon number of years or the history of his farm, the same rights and justice as the man who happens to live in some other place in my State.

Here is what I am getting at. In my congressional district there is a farm, we will say, with 2,000 acres of cotton land. That farmer has been planting it for 100 years. Unless the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE] is adopted, this cotton farmer will, in effect, be permitted to plant only 40 percent of his tillable acreage in cotton. That is too great a reduction—more than this Congress or the Department of Agriculture intended. With the adoption of this amendment, there would still be a 30 percent reduction, which is sufficient. I think that the amendment which the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE] has offered should be adopted.

The people over in my area will be drastically hurt unless that amendment is agreed to. May I say very frankly I do not think this piece of legislation that has been introduced is going to do a lot of good anyway. It is not going to relieve a lot of farmers in my district. We have been telling them we are going to do something for them, but they will find themselves on the same hook they were on a couple of months ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal here today as to how much additional money the resolution now under consideration will cost the Government. To the gentlemen so concerned, it is my impression that they are taking counsel of their own fears. I would admonish them to remember the scriptural passage that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. A few minutes ago, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] made a very enlightening statement to the effect that originally the Congress and the farmers of this country were under the impression that their acreage would be cut approximately 20 percent. When the vote was taken on December 15, many of them were still under that impression. Now we are asking for a cut of 30 percent. Do not misunderstand me. That is a 30-percent cut from the acreage actually planted and not from the acreage alloted to a county by the bureau of agricultural estimates. I know of no farmer who is not willing to take a 30-percent cut in the acreage which he actually planted in 1946, 1947, and 1948. Of course I am referring to farmers whose acreage was not substantially reduced during the war years. Most every farmer realizes that he must make a reduction in cotton acreage in order to prevent a greater surplus of cotton. He further realizes that we must prevent a surplus of any enormity if we continue to have a fair parity support-price program. So I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California will be adopted.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. Does not the gentleman know that every cotton farmer had his cotton-acreage allotment in his possession long before the vote on December 15 and knew exactly what his allotment was going to be?

Mr. HARE. That was supposed to be the case but many did not.

Mr. COOLEY. Does the gentleman say to the Members or wish to leave the impression with the House that these farmers voted in ignorance of what their actual allotments were?

Mr. HARE. Many of them did; that is true.

Mr. COOLEY. Well, I would like to have the gentlemen send the names to me, because they were issued officially and mailed to me. I never heard of such a complaint.

Mr. HARE. The gentleman well knows that I did not make a list of them because I had nothing and he had nothing to do with the actual making of the allotments. Congressmen don't administer the law. But I had numerous complaints to that effect during the period following the vote and until I returned to Washington on January 3.

It is incumbent on this Congress to act immediately in order that the farmers of this country may be protected and, by their protection, we insure economic prosperity to the textile employee, the storekeeper, the filling-station operator, the banker, and all mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the chairman and the Committee on Agriculture for bringing in House Joint Resolution 398.

On page 1 of their report the committee states that this resolution is a "1-year emergency measure," designed to authorize the correction of certain gross inequities and elimination of hardships which have appeared in the application of the cotton-quota law enacted at the last session of Congress.

May I say not only inequities and misapplications, but iniquities as well. May I also state that the same inequities and hardships apply to the wheat quota as misapplied by the Secretary of Agriculture. I am sure that the committee will also straighten out those inequities in the very near future.

This very morning I received a number of letters complaining particularly over these inequities and iniquities. Here is a farmer with 800 acres under cultivation in western North Dakota, and about the only thing they can raise as a cash crop because of weather conditions is wheat. Here is a family of seven and yet the wheat allotment out of 800 acres is only 250 acres. This will not be sufficient to take care of the family and pay real-estate taxes.

May I also state to the able chairman of the Agriculture Committee that the time has arrived to enact a real farm bill. A bill that will give the farmers cost of production for that part of their products consumed domestically. Do that for the principal agricultural commodities and then no subsidies will be necessary. Then the Government will not have to subsidize any farmer but the farmers will help bail the Government out of the six hundred and sixty-three billions that it now owes, including future commitments and obligations.

I sincerely hope that when the chairman of the Agriculture Committee gets through with straightening out the inequities and the iniquities, and the misapplications by the Secretary of Agriculture of Public Law 272, that then he will take up H. R. 1686, the bill that I have introduced to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in agricultural products.

Here is H. R. 1686:

A bill to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in agricultural products; to prevent unfair competition; to provide for the orderly marketing of such products; to promote the general welfare by assuring an abundant and permanent supply of such products by securing to the producers a minimum price of not less than cost of production; and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Agricultural Equality Act of 1949." The term "agricultural product" as used in this act shall mean any and all kinds of poultry, livestock, and any farm product of the soil, and any product or byproduct thereof, produced in the United States, in an unmanufactured or unprocessed state, which the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine, on the basis of available statistics, having a farm value in excess of $30,000,000 during the preceding marketing year. The word "producer" as used in this act shall mean the original producer of agricultural products as above defined.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain and determine for each year the average cost of production to the farmers of each such agricultural product. Such average cost of production shall be determined after public hearings, participated in by the representatives of farmers' organizations and by other interested parties. It shall include depreciation and soil depletion and all items of cost, including production expenses, interest, taxes, wages of farm and family labor, a return of 4 percent on farm property equity, and compensation to the average farm operator equivalent to the average weekly earnings of the industrial worker as found and determined by the Secretary of Labor.

(b) The Secretary shall determine, prior to the beginning of each marketing year for each basic grade, staple, classification, or quality of each of such agricultural products, an average-cost-of-production price, at the principal interior primary markets or centers of distribution, which shall be equal to the average cost of production of such agricultural product as determined under this section.

(c) The Secretary shall also calculate, and take into consideration, the average yields and production during the previous 5-year yeriod in determining the average-cost-of-production prices. If necessary, in order to carry into effect the purposes of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall further ascertain and allow an equitable differential against varying transportation costs to different markets and shall establish appropriate zones or classifications therefor.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Agriculture shall annually ascertain, determine, and designate the beginning and the ending of the marketing year for each such agricultural product and shall estimate the volume of production for the current year of each such agricultural product. He shall also annually prior to the production or planting season estimate with respect to each such agricultural product (1) the quantity and percentage of the total volume marketed from farms that is required for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve and which is to be distributed in the current of interstate commerce; (2) the quantity and percentage to be distributed in intrastate commerce affecting the price of the portion to be distributed in the current of interstate and foreign commerce; (3) the quantities and percentages remaining for foreign commerce and export.

SEC. 4. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture shall, annually, prior to the beginning of the calendar year or prior to the beginning of the marketing year of each of such agricultural products make proclamation and announcement of such determination of such average-cost-of-production price for each basic grade, staple, classification, or quality of each of such agricultural products. Such cost of production shall be the minimum price for that portion of each such agricultural product domestically used, consumed, or stored. He shall also recognize and allow the usual and customary price differentials now or hereafter recognized and established in the channels of trade on grades, staples, classifications, or qualities of each such agricultural product.

In case there is no recognized basic grade, staple, classification, or quality for any such agricultural product, then the Secretary, after public hearings, participated in by representatives of farmers' organizations and other interested parties, shall promulgate a basic grade, staple, classification, or quality for such agricultural product. He shall announce the date when such minimum prices are to take effect and they shall continue in effect during the marketing year. He shall, at the same time, announce the estimated production and domestic consumption and warehouse reserve. He shall, also, announce the total quantities and percentages of such agricultural products that are to be held for foreign commerce and export.

(b) Domestic price: After the beginning of the marketing year, for any such agricultural product, which begins July 1 in 1949, all dealers, manufacturers, millers, elevator operators, processors, packers, butchers, ginners, compressors, and other agencies dealing in interstate or foreign commerce shall pay to the producers of such agricultural products not less than such average-cost-of-production price, subject to differentials allowed under subsection (a) of this section, determined and proclaimed as aforesaid, for such percentage of each delivery of any grade, staple, classification, or quality of such agricultural product as is estimated for domestic consumption, or storage for domestic consumption.

(c) Licenses: No dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or other agency engaged in the business of dealing in or handling any agricultural product in interstate or foreign commerce shall operate as such dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or agent dealing in or handling such agricultural product without first procuring from the Secretary of Agriculture a license pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That no license shall be required of any producer under the provisions of this act for selling, disposing of, handling, or storing any agricultural product produced by him: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to poultry or livestock shipped from one State into another for working, breeding, or production on a farm or for raising, feeding, fattening, finishing, or conditioning for market prior to the sale for consumption in the regular channels of trade.

(d) Surplus receipts: Whenever the world price on the quantities and percentages of any such agricultural product remaining for export is lower than the cost-of-production price on the domestic consumption and warehouse-reserve quantities and percentages, then, when any producer of any grade, staple, classification, or quality of any such agricultural product shall deliver any such agricultural product to any dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or any other agency dealing in or handling such product in interstate or foreign commerce, such purchaser shall pay to the producer the cost-of-production price on the domestic consumption and warehouse-reserve quantities and percentages as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and the world price on the quantities and percentages for export: Provided, however, That each individual producer of any such agricultural product shall be entitled to market at the cost-of-production price a quantity of any such product produced during the marketing year in an amount not to exceed $1,000.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be issued to such dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or any other agency dealing in, or handling such product in interstate or foreign commerce, producers' receipts in triplicate showing on their faces, when filled in by the purchaser, the grade, staple, classification, or quality and quantity and the percentage of such agricultural product, as proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture to be the percentage and quantity that is required for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve, and the grade, staple, classification, or quality and quantity and the percentage remaining for export.

Every dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or any other agency dealing in or handling such product in interstate or foreign commerce, shall fill out such receipts so as to show accurately the amount of such product purchased from the producer, the amount for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve, the cost-of-production price paid, the amount purchased for export and the world price paid to the producer. Such receipts shall be signed by the purchaser and countersigned by the seller, and one copy shall be retained by the purchaser, and one delivered by him to the producer, and the third copy shall be mailed by registered mail at the end of each month to the Secretary of Agriculture at Washington, D. C., or such other post-office address as the Secretary may designate.

In the case of cotton any producer may dispose of his domestic consumption and warehouse reserve quantity and percentage and may, at the same time, keep or store his export quantity and percentage, properly earmarked for identification. Such producer, if he decreases his production or the production under his control, may, in the following marketing year, sell or dispose of such earmarked export quantity, or cotton of the current crop, to any dealer, ginner, compressor, or other agency, engaged in the business of dealing in or handling such cotton, as the cost-of-production price, to an amount equal to the quantity and percentage he would be allowed to sell for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve if he produced the same quantity of cotton as he produced in the previous year.

Such producer shall be required to file a reasonable and sufficient bond with the Secretary of Agriculture, through the dealer, ginner, compressor, or other agency, engaged in the business of dealing in or handling such cotton, to the effect that he will not sell, or permit to be sold or disposed of, directly or indirectly, any of such export quantity and percentage in the domestic market during the marketing year in which it is harvested.

SEC. 5. (a) Marketing of surplus: No dealer distributor, manufacturer, corporation, or cooperative corporation, person, firm, or association, of whatever nature, engaged in export of foreign commerce, shall, whenever the world price on the quantities and percentages remaining for export, of any agricultural product named in this act, is lower than the cost-of-production price on the domestic consumption and warehouse reserve quantities and percentages, buy, sell, exchange, or otherwise acquire or dispose of any such product intended or designated for export without first procuring from the Secretary of Agriculture a license pursuant to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Every such dealer in foreign trade and export shall be required to file a reasonable and sufficient bond with the Secretary of Agriculture to the effect that he will not sell, or permit to be sold or disposed of, directly or indirectly, any such export quantities and percentages in the domestic market, and to the effect that no part, whether manufactured or unmanufactured, whether processed or unprocessed, will be sold for distribution in the domestic market. The domestic market shall mean the continental United States and its Territorial and insular possessions.

No dealer, distributor, manufacturer, corporation, or cooperative corporation, person, firm, association, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or any other agency dealing in or handling such export products in interstate or foreign commerce, shall buy, sell, exchange, acquire, or dispose of any such agricultural product produced, bought, manufactured, processed, or acquired by him for export, except to a licensed buyer engaged in the business of foreign trade and export.

(b) Such dealer, distributor, manufacturer, corporation or cooperative corporation, person, firm, or association engaged in export of foreign commerce may sell at or above the world price export quantities and percentages of any agricultural product to any processor or manufacturer for processing or manufacturing into finished or semifinished and manufactured or semimanufactured products: Provided however, That such processor or manufacturer be first required to file a reasonable and sufficient bond with the Secretary of Agriculture to the effect that such finished or semifinished or manufactured or semimanufactured product or any byproduct thereof will not be sold or disposed of directly or indirectly for domestic consumption or warehouse reserve. Such finished or semifinished or manufactured or semimanufactured product together with any byproduct shall be exported to foreign markets unless the Secretary upon investigation finds that there no longer is an exportable surplus and that some or all of such products or byproducts are needed for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve.

(c) Adjustment of supply to demand: If the quantity and percentage estimated for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve should be insufficient by reason of flood, drought, pestilence, or other calamity, or for any other reason, to supply the demand for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve, then the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to supply such shortage out of export quantities and percentages, still owned by the producers, at the cost-of-production price, plus storage and expenses. If, however, the quantity and percentage estimated for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve is more than sufficient, then the Secretary shall allow the same for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve the following year and shall reduce by an equal amount his estimate for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve.

REGULATIONS

SEC. 6. The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to prescribe regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act. The regulations prescribed pursuant to this act shall include among other things requirements with respect to the issuance of licenses to dealers, manufacturers, millers, elevator operators, processors, packers, butchers, ginners, compressors, and other agencies engaged in the business of dealing in or handling such agricultural products in interstate or foreign commerce, systems of accounts, auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them and the entry and inspection by the duly authorized agents of the Secretary of Agriculture of the place of business of such licensees.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall upon request furnish to all persons required to have a license under this act, such information as may be necessary or appropriate for carrying out the provisions of this act.

PENALTY FOR VIOLATION

SEC. 7. Any dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or other agent dealing in or handling any agricultural product in interstate or foreign commerce, who violates the provisions of this act by knowingly and willfully paying less than the average-cost-of-production price determined and proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture, or violates any other provisions of this Act, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 8. Any agricultural product, now owned or hereafter coming into the possession of the Government of the United States, or any department or agency thereof, shall be conclusively deemed to be exportable surpluses, and shall be disposed of only in accordance with the provisions of this act providing for the disposal of export quantities and percentages.

SEC. 9. In order to carry out the purposes of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed that whenever he finds, upon investigation, that the world price, computed in United States currency, of any foreign agricultural product or substitute, in its processed or manufactured or in its unprocessed or unmanufactured state, is below the cost-of-production price of any competing domestic agricultural product, in its processed or manufactured or in its unprocessed or unmanufactured state, to notify the Secretary of the Treasury thereof. It shall thereupon become the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to levy and collect upon such foreign competing agricultural product or substitute notwithstanding that such agricultural product or substitute may have been originally produced in the United States or in any of its possessions, in its processed or manufactured or in its unprocessed or unmanufactured state, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions, a duty equal to the difference between the world price and the cost-of-production price of such product, plus 5 percent of such cost-of-production price.

SEC. 10. Until further action by Congress the following agricultural products as defined herein shall come under the provisions of this act: Milk, butterfat, corn, beef cattle, veal calves, lambs, sheep, goats, hogs, wool, mohair, wheat, cotton, eggs, oats, chickens, tobacco, potatoes, cottonseed, barley, soybeans, oranges, apples, wool, grain sorghums, beans, turkeys, tomatoes, sweet sorghums, peanuts, grapes, peaches, rice, sugar beets, sweetpotatoes, flaxseed, lettuce, strawberries, pears, grapefruit, onions, peas, snap beans, celery, lemons, rye, cabbage, and sugarcane.

SEC. 11. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, on or before January 1 of each year after January 1, 1950, to report any agricultural product as herein defined and not included under the provisions of this act, that had a farm value in excess of $30,000,000 the previous year, to the chairman of the Agricultural Committee of both the House and the Senate. He shall state, in such report, the average market price paid to the producers for such product or products during the previous year, and shall state the cost-of-production price of such product or products if they had been under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. This act shall apply to agricultural products, as herein defined, as may be owned by the producers or as may be grown, produced, and harvested during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1949, and all subsequent years.

SEC. 13. For the purpose of expediting the sale and distribution of any agricultural product under the provisions of this act, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans to any dealer, manufacturer, miller, elevator operator, processor, packer, butcher, ginner, compressor, or other agency engaged in the business of dealing in or handling any agricultural product on that percentage of any such agricultural product as is designated for domestic consumption and warehouse reserve. The amount of any such loan on any such product shall not exceed, together with interest, the cost-of-production price as determined under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 14. No penalty shall be imposed or license canceled, under the provisions of this act, until the person to be fined, or whose license is to be canceled, has been found guilty of violating the provisions of this act by a United States district court.

SEC. 15. All acts or part or parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed. Nothing, however, herein shall be held to repeal, amend, or modify the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1946 edition, title 16, secs. 590a–590h, 590i, 590j–590q); sections 201 or 202 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (U. S. C., 1946 edition, title 7, secs. 1291, 1292); the Federal Crop Insurance Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1946 edition, title 7, secs. 1501–1519); or section 32 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1935, as amended (U. S. C., 1946 edition, title 7, sec. 612c).

SEC. 16. If any provisions of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision, shall not be affected thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SUTTON].

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, there was a question asked by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORRIS] whether a promise was made to farmers that no 40-percent provision would be included in this resolution. I would like to answer that question, being a Member of the subcommittee that wrote the bill on cotton.

No promise was made to anyone on any provision. In December some of the Members of the cotton subcommittee came to Washington; some did not. It was not an executive session of the subcommittee, so no promise was made to any cotton farmer in the United States of America that the 40-percent provision would be or would not be included in the bill; in fact, I believe I am correct in this, and if not, the Chairman will correct me if I am wrong that in his original resolution the 40-percent provision was not contained therein, but after Members of Congress came over to our committee and testified—and there were about 60 Members present, they suggested that this provision be inserted in the resolution. It was also suggested by the Department of Agriculture. So, at their suggestion this 40-percent provision was added. In the subcommittee on agriculture I voted against this 40-percent provision, but now I see that I was wrong, and the reason it is wrong is because it is a promise to the people that next year we will have this 40-percent proviso excluded. With all due respect to my able colleague, the gentleman from California, this will take cotton away from Alabama, away from Arkansas, and away from Oklahoma, and add to California's quota. I do not blame my able colleague from California, for he is doing a wonderful job for the farmers out there. But, that is exactly what this will do.

It is a matter of doing one of two things, my friends. We are supposed to allot this cotton acreage. Do you want additional cotton or do you want to reduce the yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. If this 40-percent limitation is stricken from the bill, of course additional acreage will be added and the financial responsibilities of the Government to that extent will be increased. The information we have indicates that with the 40-percent limitation in the bill, approximately 100,000 fewer acres of cotton will be needed to bring the reductions up to 70 percent of the average number of acres planted in the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, or to 50 percent of the highest acreage planted in any 1 of the 3 years, allowing in both instances for such acreage as might have been diverted to war crops. This provision is definitely a limitation on the other provisions, through which we hope to elminiate hardships and inequities. To plant 40 percent of the cleared and tillable land in one crop, year in and year out, certainly would not be compatible with our ideas of good farming.

As just pointed out by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SUTTON], no promise was made with regard to this limitation either expressly or by implication, other than to the extent that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. Nothing whatever was said about the 40-percent provision, but it is deemed to be in the interests of good husbandry and proper soil-conservation practices and in the rotation system. It seems to me that to strike it out would carry with it some implication to the effect that we were not so much interested in the rotation of crops and in good soil-building and conserving practices.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. Is it not true that this 40-percent provision in the identical words that it is carried now has been in the law since 1938?

Mr. COOLEY. I think the gentleman is correct. It seems to me this limitation should remain in the bill, in view of the fact that we did liberalize the 70-percent provision when we permitted diverted acres to be considered in the final acreage allotment.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. May I ask the gentleman how on earth a soil-conservation matter can be involved in a 1-year emergency program?

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly it can be involved. It is just a matter of degree. There is no reason why a man with 2,000 acres of land, as stated in the illustration used a moment ago, should be permitted to plant 1,400 acres of cotton on that land, because it is not good farming to engage in such practices. So I insist that this amendment be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

The White of California amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WHITE of California) there were—ayes 21, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WICKERSHAM: On page 2, line 2, after "1948" insert, "or 70 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm in 1940, 1941, and 1942."

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time that when the vote is taken on my amendments, the amendments be reported again. I will use my time now, Mr. Chairman, to explain 4 very brief amendments. I want to state that I intend to support H. J. Res. 398; however, this resolution would be greatly improved with the adoption of the amendments which I am offering.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, one of these amendments is very brief. It provides a base of 70 percent of the years 1940, 1941, and 1942, which were the last years marketing quotas were in effect. During those years the farmers and the PMA committees have the records and it would be fair to the certain areas which diversify. The other amendment would provide that you could not cut a farm below 50 percent of the 1949 acreage. In the areas which have diversified so greatly, as in western Oklahoma, even though on paper Oklahoma apparently has a good acreage, in the areas which I represent, many of the farmers are cut from 75 percent to 100 percent, even though they failed to grow cotton only 3 years out of the last 50.

Many of our farmers in Oklahoma farm 3 years to cotton and 3 years to wheat, and further diversify by planting grain sorghums and types of legumes.

The other amendment would provide that the individual farms have some incentive to give up their allotments. In subsequent years it would return the allotment to the individual farms.

The fourth and final amendment, Mr. Chairman, would aid certain areas, similar to the manner in which California, New Mexico, and Arizona were aided last year. It would aid certain areas, such as mine, which will not come into cotton production until 1949 because the year they came into production, in 1947 or 1948, they had to grow wheat. They found it uneconomical to grow wheat. The amendment would provide that the Secretary might reallocate to those particular areas the 350,000 acres which are not going to be used under the provisions of this bill, but which would have been used under the original act, which areas do not have adequate acreage allotments.

In my particular area we have 74,000 acres which have come under irrigation in the last 2 or 3 years. These acres cannot raise wheat economically or profitably. They will not be permitted to raise cotton. They must raise one of the two commodities. This amendment would permit the Secretary to allocate a cotton allotment to that area, which allotment would not be deducted from the dry-land farmers.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call your attention to some letters which I will read for the information of the Members, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Arapaho, Okla., January 16, 1950.

Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Member of Congress,
Seventh District,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WICKERSHAM: We have your letter of January 6 in which you ask for our suggestions as to changes that we would like to see here in Custer County.

We have just returned from a State convention at Oklahoma City and all of the members of the county committee and the county administrative officer attended. Mr. J. H. Vowell, chairman of the Custer County PMA committee, was chairman of the Committee on Allotments and Marketing Quotas. I am attaching a copy of the report made by the committee to the convention. The county committee and myself have checked it over carefully and the recommendations made in the report is what we would recommend for Custer County.

We would like to call to your attention particularly to the first sentence in the report with reference to using only crop history and be adjusted by the county committee in establishing all kinds of allotments, instead of using a formula system as has been used in establishing the 1950 cotton acreage allotments. We can see where the formula system would work in maybe one or two States in the Nation, that is where the principal crop is cotton and the same percentage of the cropland on the farm is planted to cotton each year, but it will not work in a mixed crop area such as Custer County or Oklahoma.

We would also like to call to your attention particularly to paragraph 7 of the report which recommends that a reapportionment system be set-up for each commodity. That is we would like to see a provision in the law whereby a farmer that did not plant a portion of his allotment that year, be so that he could release that part of the allotment in order that it could be reallocated by the county committee on farms where additional allotment can be planted. Some of such cases would be to veterans that have had to rent farms that have no crop history; to farm operators that have changed farms where conditions do permit the planting of this commodity but the farm is not eligible for an allotment; and to increase allotments where other hardship conditions exist.

We wish to thank you for your letter and wish to advise that the information that we have given you is only a suggestion, but we do feel that the enactment of this provision would improve the farm program in this county.

Very truly yours,

RUSSELL E. DILL,
County Administrative Officer.

COMMITTEE NO. 3—ALLOTMENTS AND MARKETING QUOTAS

A majority of the committee members felt that crop acreage history should be the basis of establishing farm allotments for all commodities and recommended that county committees be given considerably more latitude in making adjustments. They felt that the present reserves available to the county committees were not adequate to provide equitable allotments. There was some feeling among committeemen from the wheat area that possibly cropland ratio factor approach might be better for establishing wheat allotments than the history basis.

The committee was in unanimous agreement that an acreage planted in excess of the allotment of any commodity should not become a part of the history from which allotments are to be determined in future years.

The committee was of the opinion that a total soil-depleting allotment for each farm should be established and that the acreage classified as cropland which was in excess of the total soil-depleting allotment would be the soil-conserving base for the farm and that the application of approved practices on this land as well as compliance with the special allotments would be a condition of eligibility for price support. The approved practices to be determined by the Department.

The committee declined to make any recommendation on a joint compliance provision.

The committee recommended that any person who knowingly overplanted the allotment for any commodity would not be eligible for ACP practice payments.

The committee favors the use of the same base period for determining farm allotments for all commodities.

It was the consensus of the committee that we should always have a release and reapportionment provision for all commodities as a means for the county committee to adjust inequities in farm allotments.

The committee felt that a person who released his acreage allotment should retain his eligibility and be credited with a planted acreage equal to the acreage released and the person to whom the apportionment of this acreage is made will not be credited with the planted acreage for the purpose of determining future allotments. The acreage is to be released to the county committee for use in the county.

The committee was very anxious that the allotments should be distributed in such a way that substantially all the county allotment would be planted since our share of the national allotment will be reduced in proportion to the decrease in our acreage history.

In order that the county committees will not be obliged to establish allotments on idle farms and on farms on which no land is available for the production of the commodities, the committee believes that a "tillable acreage available" provision should be made for use of the county committee in establishing allotments for all commodities.

The committee was in favor of continuing the use of the present strict interpretation of the definition of a farm.

It was the opinion of the committee that a uniform policy should be adopted in all counties for determining new farm allotments for all commodities so that the same treatment will be given to all producers in all counties.

The committee favored the continued use of the 3-year eligibility period.

The committee was unanimous in their opinion that the eligibility for price support on one commodity should depend on compliance with allotments for all other commodities.

The committee recommended that penalty on excess be based on the actual production from the excess acreage.

The majority of the committee members were opposed to 1,000-pound exemption provision for cotton.

The committee recommended a 3-acre minimum allotment for all producers eligible for peanut allotment. This acreage to be in addition to the National, State, and county allotment.

The committee thought that the final date for determining the tillable acreage available for peanuts should be between the 1st and 15th of July.

TALOGA, OKLA., January 16, 1950.

Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR VICTOR: I will try to give you some of our problems on administering the farm program at the county level.

I am for the farm program and controlled production, for I believe acreage control is the only way we can hope to continue to receive fair prices for our farm commodities.

The system set up for wheat-acreage allotments, based on actual history on the farm, worked very nicely, and we feel it was fair to everyone. Ninety-five percent of the farmers are satisfied with their wheat allotment; however, when it comes to cotton, it is a different thing.

With cotton allotments based on cropland instead of history, in lots of cases a farmer who has had cotton only 1 year in the 1946–48 period gets more allotment than his neighbor who has had cotton every year, which won't work satisfactorily. Also, the war-crop credit on cotton works to a disadvantage. In Dewey County, there are 155 farmers that received cotton allotments, to which they are not entitled, through war-crop credits alone. This works a hardship on the cotton farmer who received very little allotment and who is a consistent cotton grower.

We feel in our county that something should be done to eliminate war-crop acreage, and the cotton acreage be given to the cotton farmer who derives his family income from cotton.

I also feel that if a farmer doesn't intend to use his cotton allotment, it should be permissible for him to turn it in at the county office to be redistributed.

I know you are anxious to do everything in your power to help us farmers, which we appreciate.

Very truly yours,

W. T. (TOM) MATTHEWS.

GRIMES, OKLA., January.

DEAR WICKERSHAM: I am writing you in regards to the cotton allotment.

We have rented a place a half section of land.

It's got 162 acres of cultivation and its got only 29 acres of cotton and I paid $400 a year for it.

It will take about 7 or 8 acres to make a bale. It's going to be hard for me to pay $1,600. It wouldn't raise wheat and I wish you would consider that and see if you can help me get more cotton than what the bankers require is more cotton and I have to fertilize that.

I have a big family and I am afraid if I don't get more cotton I will have to leave the farm.

Your truly,

DAVE ELIFRITS.

ELK CITY, OKLA., January 26, 1950.

Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM.

Dear Sir: I am writing you in regard to my cotton allotment. I am a small farmer and have 80 acres of land with 73 acres in cultivation. They set my allotment at 19½ acres. I filed a protest with the county committee so I got notice yesterday to meet with the committee today at Sayre to see about it and met with them and they cut me 4 acres more which leaves me with only 16½ acres. To begin with, they allotted me 26 acres for wheat, which I didn't want and they say they can't take it back. There are lots of farmers that have wheat acreage and they don't want it. There are lots of farmers who have cotton acreage that they don't want. Now I am asking you why Congress won't release all this acreage and have it redistributed. Beckham County is in an uproar about this. How can I make a fair living on 16½ acres of cotton? I have always been for the New Deal. Have been a Democrat all my life. Have stood by you and the national administration, I have been living here for 49 years. Have served in several different ways in helping the Government. So now then if there isn't something done about these allotments, I am through with the present set-up.

The boys at Sayre tell me their hands are tied unless Congress acts on the matter. If you were here and heard the farmers in general express themselves, you would certainly be surprised, and if things are not ironed out, the Democratic Party is going to be hurt bad in the next election.

Please excuse the long letter as it was the shortest way I could get the facts before you. Would be very glad to hear from you as to how you stand.

Thanking you, I remain very truly,

O. O. LYRIG.

ALTUS, OKLA., January 24, 1950.

The Honorable VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WICKERSHAM: The cotton allocation program has reached a point in this area now where there is little hope for new growers to participate on a large enough scale to justify the operations of growing cotton.

There are 836 farmers in Jackson County who do not have cotton allocated for their farms. It is estimated that 70 percent of these farmers would like to grow cotton. There are many other farmers whose maximum planted acreage during the period of 1945 to 1948 limits their cotton acreage to a particularly low percent of their total farm. The three cases for which we are including figures will best illustrate the problem of these men.

On the farm operated by W. H. Luderson, the acreage planted to various crops during the history years for cotton are as follows: On this quarter section of land in 1941 there were 30.6 acres of cotton; 23.6 acres of wheat; 40.4 acres of grain sorghum; 15 acres of barley; 17.6 acres of peas. Since that date the farm has been operated entirely as a wheat farm. In 1945 there were 139 acres of wheat and the same acreage reported in 1946, 1947, and 1948. The 1942 crop allotment included 50 acres of cotton and 20.8 acres of wheat. This particular case represents many similar ones that have come under the irrigation program during the past year.

Another case where the farmer has no cotton acreage has a cropping history as follows: In 1941 there were 69.2 acres of cotton; 16.2 acres of wheat; 10.7 acres of oats; 50 acres of barley; 83.5 acres of alfalfa; and 50 acres of green manure. In 1945 there were 196.1 acres of wheat; 83.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1946, 187 acres of wheat; 16 acres of oats; and 76.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1947 there were 207 acres of wheat; 72.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1948 there were 207 acres of wheat; 72.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1949 there were 155 acres of cotton; 199 acres of wheat; 40 acres of oats; and 40.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1942 this farm was allocated 98.4 acres of cotton; 25.4 acres of wheat. There is no cotton allocated for 1950, and this farm is another farm that came under irrigation in 1949.

The last case that we included for your consideration is a dry-land farm. On this quarter section in 1941 there were 35 acres of cotton; 12.2 acres of wheat; 31.3 acres of grain sorghums; 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1945 there were 16.2 acres of cotton; 32.4 acres of wheat; 29.9 acres of grain sorghum; and 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1946 there were 66 acres of wheat, 12.5 acres of grain sorghum, and 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1947 there were 10.6 acres of cotton; 66 acres of wheat; 1.9 acres of grain sorghum; and 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1948 there were 66 acres of wheat; 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1949 there were 17.5 acres of cotton; 66 acres of wheat; 70 acres of alfalfa. In 1942 this farm was allocated 53 acres of cotton and 11.2 acres of wheat. This farm was allocated 10.6 acres of cotton for 1950.

These cases are representative of the farmers who have low cotton acreage allocated and farmers who have none. It is this type farmer in this area who feels inequality in the cotton acreage program. These cases are called to your attention to see if the forthcoming legislation can be adapted to increase cotton acreage for these farmers.

Anything you can do to help these cases will help many farmers in this part of the country.

Your very truly,

D. H. TRENT,
Chairman, Cotton Growers' Committee.

HOLLIS, OKLA., December 4, 1949.
Congressman VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR VICTOR: It hasn't been my policy to be calling on my Congressman in the past for assistance, but I am asking a little favor of you. If it is in your power to do anything about it, I will appreciate it very much.

Last year I moved on a place here, north of Hollis, that has been planted to wheat only 4 years, therefore, there is no cotton allotment on it. I have 100 acres of cotton on it this year but, of course, that does not count anything on next year's.

I am told that there is quite a number of acres set aside for new-grower allotments. Mr. Jones, the head of the AAA in this county tells me that I am due consideration for a part of that allotment and he went with me before the county committee but they won't do anything about it saying I got a nice wheat allotment and am not entitled to any cotton.

I have always tried to diversify my crops and not go the one-crop route, and I feel that it is no fault of mine that there has not been cotton on the land before and if this new-grower allotment does not affect me, how would I ever go about building up a cotton allotment not getting to plant any? I have always complied with the Government program and do not ask anything that is unfair or unjust. I have offered to yield part of my wheat allotment in order to have a mixed crop but they tell me I can't do that. So if you will look into this for me, I will appreciate it very much.

I am wishing for you and yours a very merry Christmas and if at any time I can be of any help to you down here, will be glad to do so.

Sincerely yours,

EDD DUDEK.

MAYFIELD, OKLA., January 14, 1950.
Representative VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR VIC: I've gotten more information since writing you, that I'm sending. I could write Stillwater committeemen but feel that you can do more, quicker.

Last spring I didn't sign up on the AAA program. It didn't suit me because money required to finance it would raise taxes. The talk was if a big '49 crop was made some kind of program would be necessary, so I reduced my cotton acreage.

The Sayre record shows that instead of the county committeemen sending someone out to get the number of acres I had in cotton they just put down a zero.

In '46 their record shows I had 40 acres of cotton and 93 acres in cultivation.

In the latter part of '46 and first of '47 I broke up approximately 18 or 20 acres that I planted in cotton the following 2 years making approximately 25 acres.

Now that I haven't a wheat allotment or other money crops, I need 35 or 40 acres in cotton.

My farm hasn't very good pasture, so cattle aren't advisable except a few dairy cows.

My total amount of tillable land is about 112 or 115 acres.

Respectfully yours,

FRANK LYON.

NATIONAL FARM LOAN ASSOCIATION OF SAYRE,
Sayre, Okla., January 13, 1950.
Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR VICTOR: Was just thinking about the farm program, and in my talks with various farmers have decided that a change should be made immediately in the farm program to provide an opportunity for farmers who have wheat allotments but don't want them to turn them back to the AAA office and also the many farmers who got cotton allotments but do not want them to do likewise.

This should be done in this manner as many cotton farmers have wheat but don't want it and many wheat farmers have cotton but don't want it; let the wheat farmer turn in his cotton, the county committee would pool these acres and divide it up with the cotton farmers who wanted a larger cotton allotment—giving preference first to the cotton farmer that had turned in his wheat allotment. The wheat acres could be handled on the same basis when the 1951 crop is allotted.

I know many farmers that have cotton acres but will not plant it and these acres should be in production. Most of these who don't plant cotton are wheat farmers and would be glad to cooperate in a program as set up on the above basis.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM D. LAKEY.

Congressman VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Due to the fact that my allotment for cotton is so small, I decided to write and see if you could help in any way.

Here is my problem: In Beckham County—SE¼ sec. 16, township 11, range 22—I've rented 160-acre farm; 135 acres of work land, which will raise only grain and cotton.

I've gone to the triple A office and they told me I was supposed to get 51 acres of cotton, but when I got my acreage it was only 7 acres.

I have a family of five to support. Two of my children are in school. My rent is $550 cash rent. Now how can I make a living for my family and pay my cash rent?

Will you please try and help me get my cotton allotment raised? If only you could only help me get it raised to 30 acres, it sure would help me.

Sincerely yours,

J. P. KIRK.

CANUTE, OKLA., January 21, 1950.

DEAR SIR: This is in regard to the new farm plan for 1950. I am a young farmer, with a wife and four children to support on a small farm of 80 acres in the heart of cotton country in western Oklahoma. It appears that the Government, through this farm plan, is going to take my means of livelihood from me. Here are the details, as brief as possible:

I have been opposed from the beginning to all price supports, all or part of parity, and of course to any controls that hinder a farmer's freedom. When my county committee issued work sheets to the farmers with questions concerning how much cotton, corn, wheat, oats, etc., was planted for the past several years I stood on my rights and refused to cooperate or have anything to do with it. I let it be understood that as long as it was voluntary—which it was at the time—I wanted none of it but that if it was voted in and of course became compulsory I would then sign up, not willingly but of necessity in order to raise cotton and sell it, cotton being by far the greatest cash crop on my farm and all others in this community.

I did just that as soon as it was voted and passed in the referendum December 15. However, because the plan was unfairly written, in the first place, and unfairly administered, in the second, all the cotton acreage that was allocated to my county was allotted to the individual farmers the first time around, leaving none to settle cases like mine and the appeals. Up to this time I have received no cotton allotment. I have been to see the county committee and chairman several times since I signed up after the referendum, and they say there is nothing they can do. I believe they have applied for more acreage from the Government to settle the appeals. I have been planting about 20 acres to cotton and must have about that much this year.

Under this farm plan and the system of allotting cotton acreage, the farmer who has been planting the most of his land to cotton the past 3 years gets the biggest allotment. And the farmer who has been planting sweet clover and raising his own feed and cutting down his cotton acreage to do that has to take a cut along with the rest. In other words, the farmer who has been hogging cotton and has created our surplus is the one that benefits the most from this plan. Is there anything you can do to help me.

Respectfully yours,

ESTIS L. JOHNSON.

ELDORADO, OKLA., October 17, 1949.

DEAR FRIEND VICTOR: We knew before receiving your letter that heaven and earth are being moved to give Altus irrigated lands more cotton acres. (Some millionaire bankers and land grabbers are interested there.)

But that doesn't change the fact that wheat farmers in southwest Oklahoma have been sold down the river in the allotments. All my land has been devoted to wheat for 3 years but I am cut 36 percent. Some States have only 12-percent cut, some have 25 percent, and different adjoining farms have varying cuts from their historic base and the principle of the historic base is 100 percent rotten. Every farmer should be permitted to place all his land in a base of whatever crop he wishes to grow, and then have the same rate of reduction on every farm in the Nation, regardless of how high it may be. It seems Congressmen and Senators just can't understand the situation. Maybe we can speak in your language about November 1950.

Very truly yours,

T. A. ROBINSON.

ALTUS, OKLA., November 12, 1949.

Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Mangum, Okla.

DEAR MR. WICKERSHAM: Relative to our discussion on cotton-acreage allocation for the irrigation project in Jackson County, we wish to inform you that the provisions of the recent Public Law 272 have not given us any relief on our problem of curtailed cotton acreage.

The letter that Mr. Hutchinson sent to you further confirms the information we had received from Members of Congress and Senate that we might expect relief from the 15 percent of cotton acreage, which can be held by the State and county PMA offices for adjustments of hardship cases. In our meeting on November 3 with the State PMA committee, their interpretations on this particular part of the law still left us without consideration farmers feel is due them on the irrigation project.

The thing that is happening on this project can best be illustrated by using one farm as an example. On a 320-acre farm there has been no cotton planted previous to 1949 during the period on which cotton-acreage history is based. In 1949, there were planted 150 acres of cotton. There have been 80 acres of alfalfa during 1946, 1947, and 1948, which may be used in lieu of cotton acreage. Wheat has been the principal crop, however, on this farm, and the 1950 acreage allocation is 155 acres.

As we have stated before, wheat is not favored as an irrigated crop, because it does not pay enough through increased production to offset the costs of irrigation and related costs of land preparation and increased machinery operation. The very maximum acreage that could be planted on this 320 acres to cotton in 1950 will be 48 acres, provided there had been any cotton history on the land during the years of 1946, 1947, or 1948. The main reason that cotton was not grown during these years was because irrigation was not available. In 1949, water was first available for irrigation and 155 acres were planted to cotton this year.

We believe, as we have been informed by our Congressmen, that the 15 percent of acres held by State and county committees would go a long way in alleviating our situation next year. We have not received any consideration due to irrigation, however, from the State PMA committee.

Is there anything you can do to help us?

Yours very truly,

D. H. TRENT.

ELK CITY, Okla., January 1, 1950.

Congressman WICKERSHAM,
Washington, D. C.

CONGRESSMAN: I am writing you in regard to the way some of us farmers have had our cotton acreage allotted.

At the present time I am only farming 113 acres, since the allotment before the war was lifted I have been raising from 70 to 95 acres, no wheat on this plot of land, the balance in grain sorghums. Now, I have been allotted 1 acre of wheat and 42.8 acres of cotton. How can we small farmers continue to operate on reductions as this? Some of my neighbors were allotted more cotton acreage this year than they have ever planted in the past. I have been to my county office twice about it, but can't get anything done about it. Please tell me if there is any way you can help me secure more cotton acreage.

Yours truly,

ORBIE L. GIBBINS.

MARTHA, OKLA., January 20, 1950.

Mr. H. P. MOFFITT,
Executive Officer, Production and Marketing Administration, Stillwater, Okla.

DEAR SIR: I have this date received a reply from the county PMA committee in regard to my appeal for reconsideration of cotton acreage allotment on my farm (county serial No. C–107). This appeal was based primarily on the fact that an error was made in recording cotton history on my farm for the year 1948. There was about 47 acres of cotton planted on this farm in 1948 which was not shown in this history. No consideration was given for this since the allotment was not changed from the original allotment of 12.2 acres, for the quarter section. If the calculations were made properly according to law, the average would have been more in proportion to the required acreage to make the farm operate on a paying basis.

Reference is made to section 344, paragraph (f) (2) and (3), of the cotton acreage and allotments and marketing quota law, Eighty-first Congress. Also to paragraph (g) (2). To my knowledge the survey required by paragraph (i) was not made, thus the discrepancy in acres planted in 1948.

It is respectfully requested that this allotment be further reviewed in view of the following facts:

1. This farm was purchased by me in 1947 to produce cotton.
2. The farm was already seeded to wheat when purchased.
3. Cotton was planted as soon as possible.
4. County records do not show 1948 cotton.
5. The allocated acres will not produce sufficient net income to cover irrigation assessments, taxes, and interest, since it is a proven fact that in this area that wheat will not give the return under irrigation that cotton will.

Respectfully,

NELSON DOUGHTY.

ALTUS, OKLA., September 22, 1949.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I am interested in the cotton acreage for Oklahoma since I am just a small farmer in Jackson County. I would like for Oklahoma to keep it's quota of acreage and not a bit more. I hope it will be possible to do a little shifting so that all of Oklahoma's acres will grow cotton. In Jackson County would be a good place to shift unwanted cotton acres from other counties.

JOHN CHENAULT.

ELDORADO, OKLA., September 19, 1949.

DEAR FRIEND VICTOR: I am sure you know what the Agriculture Department means by the term, "historic base." I have been trying to say to you, that, in many instances in our section, this historic base serves to confiscate our wheat lands.

I have planted all my land in wheat for the last 3 years, but I have a 36-percent reduction due to historic base, because I formerly planted some cotton. Here at Eldorado the farmer with an all-wheat historic base is required to reduce 23⅓ percent while just across the river, in Texas, they have to reduce only 16 percent. And their situation as to soil and farming practice is exactly like here. Because of this injustice to plant all their land to wheat and that will make a rotten situation.

I repeat you don't know how mad we are.

Yours truly,

T. A. ROBINSON.

Congressman VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I own a farm in your district from which the rent is my income. I am 72 years old. We, the tenant and I, have been planting most of it in cotton, especially since the allotments were removed in 1943.

Now the PMA has alloted us only about 40 percent of the amount we have been planting since 1943. A cut of 60 percent seems very unfair to me when the talk was for a 20-percent cut on the acres planted in recent years. Does it seem fair to you?

What can you do about it?

Sincerely yours,

MRS. IDA CAMPBELL.

BLAINE COUNTY ABSTRACT CO.,
Watonga, Okla., December 24, 1949.

Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
United States Representative, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We are writing you regarding the reduction in the cotton acreage for 1950, and while we have no objections to the reduction in the acreage to be planted as a matter of fact think this is a good thing, but we do want to join with the balance of the cotton growers in objecting to the manner in arriving at the allotments.

We find in our case that the cotton allotment on our land has been reduced on an average of approximately 75 percent, and this makes it almost prohibitive for the cotton farmer to make a living as a lot of the land growing cotton is not adapted to any other money-making crop.

We find that in a number of cases where the farm is largely a wheat farm they have been allotted a small cotton base and in talking with them, this cotton base is so small and due to the fact that they are set up and equipped for wheat farming only that they do not intend to plant any cotton on their allotment for cotton which will mean that this allotment will not be used in 1950 and referring particularly to Dewey County, Okla., where we have 320 acres, 129 acres is in cultivation, we have been allotted a 60-acre wheat base and 9.5-acre cotton base and this is a sandy type of soil and not adapted to good wheat growing and which cuts this farm down to a nonpaying farm unit.

In talking with one of your PMA supervisors in Dewey County, Okla., he advises that a majority of the cotton growers are very much dissatisfied with their allotment and he advises, in discussing this with him, that if the law could be changed and he thought that it should be, so that the reduced cotton acreage could be distributed to the farms adapted to cotton growing and eliminate the allotment to the wheat farm on which the farmer did not desire any cotton allotment, that the cotton farmer would receive sufficient cotton allotment to take care of his needs and not increase the allotted cotton acreage or production, in other words if the present cotton allotment would be so distributed to those desiring to raise cotton this could be done, if the law would so permit, without increasing the allotted cotton acreage.

It is true that the vote on this carried by a large majority but in a large number of cases those voting for the allotment have not received their 1950 allotment at the time of voting and did not fully understand the situation, which facts can be verified by your PMA supervisors as the cotton farmers have been coming in to their offices in droves protesting their allotment since the election.

It all comes down to this, that if the law will be rewritten so that your PMA supervisors can allot the cotton allotment to the farmers desiring and who will use it and eliminate the allotments to those that have no intention of planting cotton, the situation will be well taken care of and we urge your assistance and cooperation in adjusting this very serious situation among the farmers, retroactive to the 1950 crop.

Yours very truly,

E. T. HOBERECHT.

SAYRE, OKLA., December 20, 1949.

Mr. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Mangum, Okla.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you to see if you can help me on my cotton acreage allotment. There is 135 acres in cultivation on this place. I only have an allotment of 20 acres of cotton. The land is light. It will make an average of one-fourth to one-third of a bale per acre. I can't get by on that. This place is located 8 miles west of Elk City of 66 highway one-fourth north. This is the John Davalt farm. He runs a dairy. He served stuff and grazed it. He didn't plant any cotton at all. He died a year ago last march. I rented the place for crop rent from Mrs. Davalt. If you can help me I will appreciate it.

I need 35 or 40 acres to get by on land as light as this is.

Yours truly,

R. W. HYSMITH.

P. S.—They gave me a wheat base but this land won't grow wheat.

OLUSTEE, OKLA., December 27, 1949.

The Honorable VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to complain of the cotton allotment I received. My farm of 160 acres (149¾ acres in cultivation) received an allotment of 35 acres.

I received 70 acres wheat allotment, but owing to weather conditions will not be able to sow the 70 acres in wheat. That leaves me 35 acres of cotton. The rest of the place to be planted in whatever I may. There will be no support price. I feel that this is a grave injustice as I owe $5,000 on farm. Taxes and interest to pay and only 35 acres of crop in supported prices. Grain sorghums, barley, and oats will not have a support price. Besides interest, there are 6 in family and living costs are high.

If I can't get more than 35 acres in cotton I surely will lose my farm. I am too old to make a living for my family as a laborer. No one wants to hire a man 60 years old.

Please do something about this cotton restriction.

It looks as if a bunch of cheap politicians will run the farmer into the hole and ruin him.

Yours truly,

C. M. KEITH.

ALTUS, OKLA., January 6, 1950.

The Honorable VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WICKERSHAM: Many of the farmers in Jackson County, and particularly the farmers on the irrigation project, are desirous of a more favorable cotton acreage program than Public Law 272 and 439 provided. We nave been informed that Congress is working on new legislation and feel confident that the new legislation will give us relief from the situation we have at the present time.

There are 840 farmers in Jackson County who have received no cotton acreage; more than 200 of this number own land on the irrigation project. An example of a specific case can best illustrate the hardships that many farmers find themselves with at this time.

On a 320-acre farm there has been no cotton planted previous to 1949 during the period on which cotton acreage was based. In 1949 there were planted 155 acres of cotton. There were 80 acres of alfalfa grown during 1946, 1947, and 1948, 40 acres of which was planted during this period. Wheat has been the principal crop on this farm, and the 1950 acreage allotment for wheat is 155 acres. Wheat is not well suited as an irrigation crop, because it does not pay enough from increased production to offset the costs of irrigation and related costs of land preparation and machine operation.

This farm has received no cotton acreage for 1950, although the county allocation has been put out to growers and consists of 67,123 acres.

The main reason that cotton was not grown during the years of 1946, 1947, and 1948, was because irrigation was not available. In 1949, water was first available for irrigating this tract of land, and 155 acres were planted to cotton.

Anything that you can do to help the farmers in this area under circumstances as described here will be deeply appreciated.

Yours very truly,

D. H. TRENT.

APPEAL

ELK CITY, OKLA., December 31, 1949.

DEAR MR. WICKERSHAM: I am a 23-year-old veteran that has a 160-acre upland farm rented, crop rent of 96.4 acres are broke out.

The last 2 years I have been running from 75 to 80 acres of cotton so I could pay for my tractor. I got a GI loan to buy it and had only 2 years to pay for it. My payments were around $1,200 apiece so you can see that my payment and a living is all that I have made.

My landlady (Barbara Simons) has been a widow woman for the last 3 years and she has six small children from the age of 4 to 16.

With them living on the farm so that they can have a few corn, meat hogs, chicken, and rent from 70 or 80 acres of cotton they can have a decent living.

Now that we have a 19-acre wheat and 30-acre cotton allotment and where so many people are depending on 96.4 acres of upland farming land for a living we can't make ends meet. Could you tell me how I could get my cotton allotment raised 20 or 30 acres?

Mrs. Simons and I have tried the triple A office. They said everybody was treated alike, but we have to make a 160-acre upland farm do what some people make a section of bottom land do. If I don't get more cash crops so I can make part of her living and one for myself, these allotments are going to put boys like myself out of business. I really need that cotton I asked for.

Sir, why is it that a man with $50-a-week salary can buy a seven or eight thousand dollar home with a 100-percent FHA or GI loans, and boys like myself couldn't buy a farm for love or money? Could I buy one of these homes in town and farm? As you know, there is a big oil play here and farms are high.

The farm is in Beckham County and is 4 miles north of Elk City, Okla. The serial number of this farm is A172.

Thank you.

NEWELL WEBB.

FARMERS UNION COOPERATIVE GIN,
Snyder, Okla., January 20, 1950.

VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR VICTOR: Enclosed find petition which was gotten up by F. M. Jack, Adrian H. Richardson, and myself on cotton allotments. We are also sending one of the same to Senator KERR, one to Senator THOMAS, and also one to Congressman ALBERT, because of his status on the Agriculture Committee. These may not help any, but the producers in this particular territory really need some help on these allotments, and anything you can do will be greatly appreciated.

Very truly yours,

H. V. SCHOONOVER.

Subject: Cotton acreage allotment for Jackson County, Okla.

Farmers in Jackson County are disturbed over the prospects for cotton-acreage allocation. A reduction of cotton acreage will handicap farmers in paying for land and costs of farming operations. The acreage-allotment program as it is understood today will seriously impair the farming economy.

The cotton-cropping history of Jackson County during the 5 years preceding 1949 will be used as the base for figuring acreage allocations. This period is not fairly representative of the county's cotton history. During this 5-year period there was a large change from cotton to wheat production. The change was due to a shortage of labor and because farmers were asked to produce foods needed for the war. The records of the PMA office show us the cotton-acreage trend in the county. We have no accurate record for years not listed.

In 1941 there were 82,096 acres of cotton.
In 1943 there were 97,000 acres of cotton.
In 1944 there were 96,500 acres of cotton.
In 1945 there were 82,279 acres of cotton.
In 1946 there were 77,750 acres of cotton.
In 1947 there were 76,277 acres of cotton.
In 1948 there were 66,641 acres of cotton.
In 1949 there are 88,129 acres of cotton.

The wheat acreage during these years fluctuated inversely in about the same proportion:

In 1944 there were 117,500 acres of wheat.
In 1945 there were 160,000 acres of wheat.
In 1946 there were 188,000 acres of wheat.
In 1947 there were 207,000 acres of wheat.
In 1948 there were 210,000 acres of wheat.
In 1949 there were 215,000 acres of wheat.

The relatively large cotton acreage in 1949 is in part a second crop on wheat land, which accounts for the large acreages of both cotton and wheat this year. The county's wheat acreage allocation for planting this year is 152,385 acres. There are 365,000 acres of cropland in the county. Labor and machinery shortages forced a reduction in the cotton-cropping program in the county. When the veterans returned and in many cases took over farming units, their plan was to grow cotton for a cash crop to purchase machinery, land, and to start them in the farming business.

To Whom It May Concern:

We farmers in Jackson County, Okla., understand that cotton acreage allocations are to be made on the cotton- and war-cropping history for the 5-year period prior to 1949. The AAA Act of 1938, in effect with amendment changes, does not recognize the changes in agriculture of this area.

We feel that 25 percent of our land should be allocated for cotton production. Prior to 1949 our cotton acreage was small, and wheat acreage large. Wheat was grown extensively during the war, because of a labor and machinery shortage for cotton production.

We hereby petition for adjustments in cotton acreage for the irrigation project to enable us to pay the added costs of farming under irrigation. We also petition for acreage adjustments on dry land where changes from cotton to wheat were made through necessity.

We petition that all cotton growers participate on an equal basis in any concessions made for this area in adjusted cotton acreage.

The cotton-acreage controls next year will make it impossible for veterans in some cases to pay out the increased costs of farm land and the high operation costs of farming. It has already become evident that land prices will follow the cotton acreage on any farm in this area. It is our understanding that crops classed as war crops will be allowed to stand in lieu of cotton in the base period on which acreage will be figured for allocation. Wheat is not in the war-crop category. Wheat served a dual purpose during the war years, providing pasture for 50,000 beef cattle each year and producing 1,400,000 bushels of wheat for food. These conditions affect the major part of Oklahoma, and irrigation farmers have a special problem.

Irrigation land on the Altus-Lugert project will be assessed for the first time next year whether or not water is used, this in view of cotton-acreage allocations. The first year irrigation was available made it possible for farmers on the north end of the project to increase their cotton acreage in 1946. Each year since then as water has become available to users in lower regions of the project, progressively more cotton has been grown. This year there is a larger acreage due to the ability of the Bureau of Reclamation to turn water to all of the farm land included in the district. In 1946, 63 percent of the irrigated acreage was in cotton. In 1948, 44 percent was in cotton. When the entire acreage in the project finally is under water assessment, no less than 25 percent of the acreage should be used for cotton production. Of the 47,700 acres that are certified at this time as irrigable, approximately 11,000 acres are seeded to cotton. But farmers feel that under irrigation on this project it will be necessary for them to grow between twelve and fifteen thousand acres of cotton annually in order to establish a sound crop-rotation system to develop their farms to the best interest of the entire country. Because wheat has been a principle crop during the past 8 years, the wheat acreage allotment is considered excessive from an irrigation standpoint. Wheat does not respond to irrigation as cotton or other of the crops that may be available for use in a rotation planting program. The wheat allotted to the irrigation project exceeds 30,000 acres for 1950. Cotton acreages under the new program based on past production will be too low for balanced farming with irrigation.

There are inequalities in the crop-allocation program that have not been satisfactorily changed by the law recently passed to amend the AAA Act of 1938. Although there were minor changes in the law, they do not recognize the complete change that has taken place on the irrigation project since the 1938 act was in operation. The entire agricultural economy has changed from dry land farming to irrigation farming. There have been large expenses to farmers for land preparation and increased operating costs with irrigation. It will be necessary for the successful development of this project that a well diversified crop rotation system be established as soon as possible. Diversified farming is recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture as essential to a sound farm program. It will be impractical for less than one-fourth of the irrigable acres to be used in the growing of cotton. Cotton has been grown here for many years and is well adapted to this particular locality. The acreage has been limited in the past by lack of labor and water. Other cash crops and specialties will grow here, but the marketing outlets for these crops are extremely limited and have not been developed. For developing market outlets years of planning and work will be necessary. If one-fourth of the irrigated acres can be utilized for the production of cotton, one-half of the project could be developed for the production of forage crops and other livestock feeds. There will still be one-fourth of the land for growing other crops that will be needed to develop a well diversified production program. If we have a shorter acreage for cotton than the amounts asked for, the economy will be seriously handicapped, the sound development of the project will be retarded, veterans and other men who are trying to buy land on the irrigation project will be unable to pay the costs of irrigation. It is unlikely that they will even be able to finish paying for the land. The costs of construction, operation, and maintenance will destroy any benefits that could be received from irrigation in this area of the country. There have been private irrigation developments in this area that are faced with the same production problems as irrigation farmers on the reclamation project.

We believe that there is a solution to these problems that will not affect the plan of the 1938 AAA Act to curtail cotton production for the United States. If there are frozen acres in Oklahoma, we ask that such acreage be administered by the State and county PMA committees, and reallocated to growers who will use such acreage for actual production. If this plan is not feasible, then we believe that a different period of years for figuring the cotton-cropping history should be used that better represents the long period history of cotton production in Oklahoma.

We are not asking favors for minority groups, but do believe that the concessions we have requested will benefit all farmers in Oklahoma.

We have discussed these problems with our county and State PMA committees and it is with their permission and at their suggestion that we present these problems to you, because the farmers of Jackson County need relief from a situation that threatens the farm economy. Your help in alleviating the situation is asked for in good faith and will be deeply appreciated. Cotton growers of Jackson County elected the following committee to present this case: D. H. ELDORADO, OKLA.

DEAR SIRE, HA: I guess you noticed that I didn't put my return address on the envelope. I didn't want the rest of the people in Washington being jealous of me writing to you. Please don't tell them that I wrote to you and not to them.

Well, this letter has a purpose. When you see a ——— dash that means "drat" or "dratted." Well, this ——ed farm program has me down to 60 acres of wheat on one-half section of land. That is too ——— much land to be out. I have no ——— cotton base except 22.9 acres in 1945, that divided by 4 years to get my average yearly quota leaves nothing 0, or a cipher with rim knocked off. Now if I knew that I wouldn't get anything to raise for money, I would have tried to make my living according to R. A. Tillman, route 3, Eldorado, Okla. I don't know whether you know it or not but you have to make money to pay taxes with or go to the pen to say nothing of the expense of running the thing. Now, I know of one neighbor (man, wife, and child) who have 650 acres wheat. He also will have a cotton acreage. He and hired hand cut about a thousand acres in 9 days plowing. Do you reckon they can live on that much? I have another neighbor (man, wife, and two children). They have 80 acres. They will get 29 acres wheat, some cotton. Do you reckon they can live on that much?

Now, I was one of these nuts that tried to kindly carry the prewar program through the war years and am now fixing to get cut. What will people besides veterans do that have land and homes to pay for do?

Respectfully,

R. A. TILLMAN.

P. S.—Do you think I should have 50 acres cotton?

OFFICE OF COURT CLERK,
Hobart, Okla., December 16, 1949.

HON. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Congressman, Seventh Congressional District, Hobart, Okla.

DEAR SIR: It is not my purpose to burden you with matters that can otherwise be taken care of; and, too, I feel sure you receive other letters of a similar nature. I would like at this time to give you a brief outline of my allotment on the West ½ of the Northwest Quarter of Section 3, Township 8 North, Range 15, WIM, Washita County, Okla. I purchased the above-referred-to tract October 11, 1949, through the Indian Department, the title of which is being prepared at this time. So far as the records are concerned, in Washita County, there is no evidence of ownership as of yet, as it takes quite a while to go through the procedure and get the title back. This title has passed the Concho subagency and the general office at Anadarko and has been forwarded to Washington for approval. When this allotment program was called to my attention, I became concerned about the matter for the reason that I am at a loss as to how long this program will carry over and what effect it will have on the production of the money crop, as this purchase was made principally with borrowed money.

Upon investigation, I find that my allotment was 19.7 acres of cotton, and 7 acres of wheat, making a total of 26.7 acres of cotton and wheat combined, from the total of 66 acres in cultivation, which is approximately 40 percent of the tillable land. I think this allotment is a ridiculous figure, inasmuch as the land in question is a cotton farm. I also find a variation in the percentage allowed different people. A tract of 80 acres in the same county has, I understand, as high as 35 to 38 acres of cotton allotment alone.

I do not know what can be done about this, but I know of no other way of giving you the facts other than writing you as I am doing. In the first place, the 90 percent of parity, in my opinion, is a little unfair to start with. It sems to me that a farmer should be allowed 100 percent parity in order to keep on an even keel with economic conditions; however, if it is necessary for us to make a sacrifice in order to protect the economic conditions of our country, I am certainly willing to accept the 90 percent as it stands. But I am not willing to accept the ridiculous allotment that was granted to me as I mentioned above.

I sometimes wonder what our Agricultural Committee is doing and what they think will happen to the 60 percent of feed that we would be forced to produce according to the allotment as set out above. In my opinion, there would be so much feed in that particular area that one could hardly give it away.

If there is anything that you can do about this matter, it will be greatly appreciated.

Yours respectfully,

O. L. FREEZE.

ALTUS, OKLA, January 24, 1950.

The Honorable VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WICKERSHAM: The cotton-allocation program has reached a point in this area now where there is little hope for new growers to participate on a large enough scale to justify the operations of growing cotton.

There are 836 farmers in Jackson County who do not have cotton allocated for their farms. It is estimated that 70 percent of these farmers would like to grow cotton. There are many other farmers whose maximum-planted acreage during the period of 1945 to 1948 limits their cotton acreage to a particularly low percent of their total farm. The three cases for which we are including figures will best illustrate the problem of these men.

On the farm operated by W. H. Luderson, the acreage planted to various crops during the history years for cotton are as follows: On this quarter section of land in 1941 there were 30.6 acres of cotton; 23.6 acres of wheat; 40.4 acres of grain sorghum; 15 acres of barley; 17.6 acres of peas. Since that date the farm has been operated entirely as a wheat farm. In 1945 there were 139 acres of wheat and the same acreage reported in 1946, 1947, and 1948. The 1942 crop allotment included 50 acres of cotton and 20.8 acres of wheat. This particular case represents many similar ones that have come under the irrigation program during the past year.

Another case where the farmer has no cotton acreage has a cropping history as follows: In 1941 there were 69.2 acres of cotton; 16.2 acres of wheat; 10.7 acres of oats; 50 acres of barley; 83.5 acres of alfalfa; and 50 acres of green manure. In 1945 there were 196.1 acres of wheat; 83.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1946, 187 acres of wheat; 16 acres of oats; and 76.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1947 there were 207 acres of wheat; 72.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1948 there were 207 acres of wheat; 72.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1949 there were 155 acres of cotton; 199 acres of wheat; 40 acres of oats; and 40.5 acres of alfalfa. In 1942 this farm was allocated 98.4 acres of cotton; 25.4 acres of wheat. There is no cotton allocated for 1950, and this farm is another farm that came under irrigation in 1949.

The last case that we included for your consideration is a dry land farm. On this quarter section in 1941 there were 35 acres of cotton; 12.2 acres of wheat; 31.3 acres of grain sorghums; 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1945 there were 16.2 acres of cotton; 32.4 acres of wheat; 29.9 acres of grain sorghum; and 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1946 there were 66 acres of wheat, 12.5 acres of grain sorghum, and 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1947 there were 10.6 acres of cotton; 66 acres of wheat; 1.9 acres of grain sorghum; and 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1948 there were 66 acres of wheat; 75 acres of alfalfa. In 1949 there were 17.5 acres of cotton; 66 acres of wheat; 70 acres of alfalfa. In 1942 this farm was allocated 53 acres of cotton and 11.2 acres of wheat. This farm was allocated 10.6 acres of cotton for 1950.

These cases are representative of the farmers who have low cotton acreage allocated and farmers who have none. It is this type farmer in this area who feels inequality in the cotton-acreage program. These cases are called to your attention to see if the forthcoming legislation can be adapted to increase cotton acreage for these farmers.

Anything you can do to help these cases will help many farmers in this part of the country.

Yours very truly,

D. H. TRENT,
Chairman, Cotton Grower's Committee.

ELDORADO, OKLA.

DEAR FRIEND VICTOR: I am still aching about the historic base along with all your farmers. That base is made a part of the title to every farm and we all know false records have been submitted for some farms and no records on others. It would be confusing and impractical to permit farmers to change bases every year but he should have that privilege at stated intervals or when a farm changes owners or tenants. If some young Member of Congress would make a fight for that principle and then run for Senate, he would pile up a vote down here in Seventh District. I know what our farmers are thinking.

We appreciate your faithful service.

Very truly yours,

T. A. ROBINSON.

ELDORADO, OKLA., December 5, 1949.

DEAR MR. WICKERSHAM: You asked me to write you about the agriculture problem that I had. (60 acres of wheat, no cotton base, etc., with 100 acres out on my farm.) You remember the conference that we had in Hoggars office that day? I was seeking more wheat acreage in preference to cotton base and if I could get cotton base, I desired to swap it for additional wheat allotment. It seemed that nothing could be done short of an act of Congress to change it. (According to the committee.)

Well, it sure looks like I was penalized for being honest. If I'd been a —— crook and submitted my wheat acreage as from fence to fence, I'd had a decent allotment.

I told them if I could get a decent allotment, I thought maybe I could go bear hunting. But since I was cut to 60 acres, I was scared to go as I might be mistaken for a bear (bare). Anyway, a fellow would be bared if he did. In order for you to understand the situation that it puts a small fellow in, I will construct 1950 program, 60 acres wheat, which the Government said my acreage yield was—

Seven bushels per acre by $2 per bushel equals $14 per acre, minus putting $3, equals $11.

Four plowings at $1 each equals $4.

Seed and treatment, $2.75.

Sowing, 75 cents.

Total, $7.50.

Seven fifty from $11 leaves $3.50.

Three dollars and fifty cents by 60 acres equals $210, less hauling to town, less expense of loan, less what else. Oh yeah, wait 3 weeks to 3 months for your $210 loan to get back. Please don't laugh. That is a heck of a mess. Well on the outland put 35 acres oats.

Certified seed, $2.80 bushel by 53 bushels (1½ per acre), equals $140.40.

Plowing four times at $1 equals $4.

Sowing, 75 cents.

Cutting, $3.

Hauling, shoveling, and labor, oh heck, what's the use?

Say put the rest in milo which would be more expense than the other. Well, nobody wants such as that. It's $4.60 cut here now. So why should a dealer buy it when he couldn't sell it to somebody who already has some of the stuff? And if you couldn't sell it, you would have to buy something to store it in. And if you store it, you'd have to feed it to hogs or something and they are too cheap to feed, etc., on through the night.

I suggest that all farmers on the small farms be paid a pension so they can pay taxes.

Respectfully,

R. A. TILLMAN.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, amendments to the cotton-quota law are necessary to correct inequities and to eliminate hardships which are developing in connection with acreage allotments to cotton farmers. In a large number of cases the allocations under the program are obviously inequitable and unfair, and the result, if the situation is not improved, will inevitably be that many farmers and their tenants will lose their means of livelihood, unemployment will increase, and the original purpose of the quota bill will be defeated.

No amendment is going to provide the remedy sought if the acreage cut for individual farmers amounts to more than 30 percent of the average planted during the years, 1946, 1947, and 1948. I am very hopeful that the measure now before the House will, if enacted, go far toward solving the problem. This measure, to succeed, must provide additional acreage to adjust 1950 allotments to bring them up to a minimum of whichever is the largest of 70 percent of the average cotton acreage planted on a farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948 or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted on the farm in any of those 3 years. There is properly a provision in the measure which permits farmers to surender voluntarily to their county committees acreage allotted to them which they do not intend to plant in 1950. Authority should also be given to county committees to make equitable adjustments between acreage figures of the BAE and those of farmers themselves.

While I recognize that the supply-and-demand situation in cotton requires quotas for the 1950 crop if Government price supports are at 90 percent of parity are to be maintained, I am certain that the House will want to prevent drastic inequities resulting from application of the cotton-quota law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments now at the Clerk's desk may be printed in the RECORD at this point so that we may have an opportunity to see them in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of California: On page 2, line 10, strike out the figure 40 and insert in lieu thereof the figure 50.

Amendment offered by Mr. WICKERSHAM: Page 2, line 5, after the word "years", insert "or 50 percent of the acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm in the year 1949."

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON: Page 1, line 9, strike out "70" and insert "60."

Amendment offered by Mr. HARE: On page 2, line 8, after the colon and before the word "provided," insert the following: "Provided, That the allotment to each farm shall be determined by the county committee, subject to review in accordance with section 3 of this resolution, on the basis of satisfactory evidence submitted by the producers."

Amendment offered by Mr. WICKERSHAM: Page 3, line 14, after the word "State" strike out "and county" and insert a comma and "county and the individual farms which so surrendered such farm acreage allotments."

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTEN: Page 3, following line 229, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 2A. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any farmer who shows to the satisfaction of the Secretary that he has been directly engaged in the growing of cotton as his principal means of support during the years 1946, 1947, 1948 as a renter, either as a cash tenant, share tenant, or sharecropper, and that through no fault of his own the land which he has been farming is no longer available to him for farming purposes shall, if he obtains other farm land to rent or farm for which no 1950-cotton allotment has been established, be eligible to receive for such land a cotton allotment in 1950. Such allotment shall be established on the same basis as allotments are established for other farms in the county on which cotton was not planted in 1946, 1947, or 1948, except that the acreage required to provide the allotments authorized under this section shall be in addition to the county, State, and National acreage allotments proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the 1950 crop of cotton and the production from such acreage shall be in addition to the national marketing quota for such crop."

Amendment offered by Mr. REGAN: Insert the following new section 5 after section 4 and renumber succeeding sections:

"SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, the cotton acreage allotment of any new 1949 cotton farm which was completed for planting prior to March 29, 1949, by clearing, plowing, and cultivating the land and was planted to cotton for the first time in 1949 and which was not planted to any crop prior to 1949, shall be not less than 30 percent of the acreage on such farm which was planted to cotton in 1949."

Amendments offered by Mr. BECKWORTH. Page 4, after line 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 5. Section 346 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) The penalty provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to cotton produced by any person who is recognized by the county committee as being a cotton farmer if his total acreage does not exceed 5 acres.'"

And on page 4, line 7, strike out "SEC. 5." and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 6."

"SEC. 5. Section 346 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) The penalties provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to cotton produced by any veteran of World War II who is recognized by the county committee as being a cotton farmer if his total production of cotton does not exceed 5 acres. As used in this subsection the term 'veteran of World War II' means a person who served in the active military or naval service of the United States on or after December 7, 1941, and before September 3, 1945, and who has been honorably separated from such service.'"

"SEC. 5. Section 346 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) The penalties provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to cotton produced by any veteran of World War II who is recognized by the county committee as being, a cotton farmer if his total production of cotton during the year in which such cotton was produced did not exceed an amount equal to four standard bales of 500 pounds gross weight. As used in this subsection the term "veteran of World War II" means a person who served in the active military or naval service of the United States on or after December 7, 1941, and before September 3, 1945, and who has been honorably separated from such service.'"

"SEC. 5. If marketing quotas are proclaimed for the 1951 crop of cotton, farmers eligible to vote in the referendum held with respect to such crop shall be those farmers who were engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1950 and those cotton farmers who surrendered the cotton acreage allotments to their farms for 1950. As used in this section the term 'cotton farmer' means a person recognized by the county committee as being a cotton farmer."

"SEC. 5. If marketing quotas are proclaimed for the 1951 crop of cotton, farmers eligible to vote in the referendum held with respect to such crop shall be those farmers who were engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1950 and those veterans of World War II whose farms received cotton-acreage allotments for the 1950 crop but who are found by the county committee to have been unable to engage in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1950 because of the smallest of the cotton acreage allotments to their farms for the 1950 crop. As used in this section the term "veteran of World War II" means a person who served in the active military or naval strvice of the United States on or after Devember 7, 1941, and before September 3, 1945, and who has been honorably separated from such service. And on page 4, line 7, strike out "Sec. 5." and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 6."

"SEC. 5. If marketing quotas are proclaimed for the 1951 crop of cotton, farmers eligible to vote in the referendum held with respect to such crop shall be those farmers who were engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1950 and those farmers whose farms received cotton acreage allotments for the 1950 crop but who are found by the county committee to have been unable to engage in the production of cotton in the calendar year 1950 because of the smallness of the cotton acreage allotments to their farms for the 1950 crop."

"SEC. 5. If marketing quotas are proclaimed for the 1951 crop of cotton, farmers eligible to vote in the referendum held with respect to such crop shall be those farmers who were engaged in the production of cotton in the calendar year of 1950 and those persons recognized by the county committee as being cotton farmers."

SEC. 6. Section 359 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) The penalty provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to peanuts produced by any person who is recognized by the county committee as being a peanut farmer if his total acreage does not exceed 2 years.'"

Amendment offered by Mr. SYKES: Page 4, line 16, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 6. Any part of the peanut acreage allotted to individual farms in any county for 1950 under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustments Act of 1938, as amended, which will not be planted to peanuts and which is voluntarily surrendered by the owner or operator of the farm to the county committee shall be deducted from the 1950 allotments to such farms and shall be apportioned, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary to other farms in the same county. In any subsequent year, unless hereafter provided by law, acreage surrendered under this section and reallocated pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary shall be credited to the State and county."

Amendment offered by Mr. WICKERSHAM: Page 4, line 16, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 6. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary may, in his discretion, allot not to exceed 350,000 acres to new irrigation areas, which were normally cotton producing areas in 1940, 1941, and 1942, but which areas have inadequate cotton allotments under the present act due to the fact that other basic crops were planted in said areas during 1946, 1947, and 1948, which crops were found uneconomical to produce in said area."

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether we have arrived at the point where some of my amendments are applicable. I would like an opportunity to be heard on them.

The CHAIRMAN. We are still on section 1.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, is the bill open to amendment at any point, or just to section 1?

The CHAIRMAN. We are considering section 1.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. POAGE:

On page 1, line 9, strike out the words "the larger of."

And on page 2, lines 2, 3, 4, and 5, strike out the following words: "or 50 percent of the highest acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm in any one of such 3 years."

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes out the provision giving 50 percent of the highest acreage planted in any one of the 3 years. It will also strike out something more than 400,000 acres, according to an estimate of the Department of Agriculture and according to the figures presented by several of the Members this afternoon; it will probably strike out three-quarters of the total acreage added by this bill.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. GATHINGS. The gentleman has fully redeemed himself by offering this amendment.

Mr. POAGE. I thank the gentleman. This amendment will reduce materially the acreage that this bill would add to the national allotment. If you want to try to confine this bill to a measure to give real relief to those who are being destroyed by any act of Congress or interpretation of the Department of Agriculture, or both, then you should vote for this amendment.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. What would happen to the man who just came home from the war in 1948 and planted for the first time?

Mr. POAGE. He would get 70 percent of his average plantings during the base period, not to exceed 40 percent of his total cultivated land.

Now, if you want to give a reward to those who have just now developed large acreages of cotton, those who have planted large acreages one year and not consistently followed it, those who have been in and out of the cotton business, then you keep the 50-percent provision. But the 50-percent provision does not help anybody unless he has been planting practically all of his land to cotton or unless, as I said, he is an in-and-outer.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. The gentleman has been a very strong advocate of soil conservation.

Mr. POAGE. I believe very strongly in soil conservation.

Mr. SUTTON. He advocates not following the advice of the Department of Agriculture in the crop rotation provision if he strikes this out.

Mr. POAGE. No, I do not think so; because that man who has been planting all his land in cotton 1 in 3 years and all of his land in soil-conserving crops, or even any crops other than cotton on the other 2 out 3 years, has just as good history as the man who has followed the advice of the Department and planted one-third of his land in cotton every year. He still has a base of 33⅓ acres. He has got an average of 33⅓ planted during the base years, just the same as if he had planted one-third of his land in cotton every one of the 3 years. It works out exactly the same as if you had been following the more common practice of soil conservation, and if this man you speak of actually rotates his whole farm on a 3-year basis he will come out just as well as the man who divides his land every year.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to my chairman.

Mr. COOLEY. How much acreage will be involved in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. POAGE. Something over 400,000 acres taken out, if we pass this amendment. The estimates given by some of the Members here indicate it would be even more than that. Whatever it is, it is very obvious that it is now going to go to the in-and-outer and not to the man who is the regular cotton farmer, or it is going to the man who has always planted a very large acreage and who caused our cotton problem. If he has followed a 3-year rotation of his entire farm with cotton plantings only 1 year out of three like the gentleman from Tennessee describes, then he has got an average that is just as high as if he had followed the practice of planting only one-third of his land in cotton each year.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is including in those "outers" the boys who fought to save this country and who could not get out of the Army in time to plant.

Mr. POAGE. No; there has been no fighting done for this country in the last 3 years. The history of the "outers" is confined to 1946, 1947, and 1948; and there was not anyone fighting for this country in those years. Those boys were here; if they wanted to plant cotton they had the opportunity; if they did not get in the program then they have no right now to come along and say that we ought to break down the program and give them 400,000 acres, and increase the Government's liability by that much. We made provision last fall for an allotment to the boy who was prevented by military service from establishing a cotton history.

The question is very simple: Do you want to maintain a substantial reduction in the national cotton acreage, with reasonable adjustments for those cotton farmers who cannot be expected to make a living for their families under present regulations, or do you want to make this a grab bag? If you ask for too much for the man with one big year, may you not jeopardize the proper needs of the man who had grown a reasonable amount of cotton each year, and who is definitely dependent on cotton for the support of his family?

I would, of course, be glad if we could give every man the right to produce all the cotton he wants to produce, but since we know that we cannot do that and at the same time support the price, let us not get so interested in the cotton speculator who plants when he thinks his neighbors are going to reduce and who relies on something else when he thinks cotton will not be profitable that we are unable to get relief for the man whose children are not going to have shoes unless he can get a reasonable percentage of the cotton he has planted year after year.

The 50-percent provision jeopardizes this whole bill. It will endanger its passage in the House and certainly it will slow down its passage in the Senate. Our farmers need relief and they need it now. They are planting cotton in south Texas today. We cannot afford to slow up the passage of this bill. We cannot afford to take a chance on having it defeated. As our good friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], said, I would rather have a part of something than all of nothing any day in the week, and I know that the 70-percent provision is of far more importance to far more real cotton farmers who have always depended on cotton than is the 50-percent provision. I think that if we were to strike the 50-percent provision, we would have no trouble promptly passing the bill through both Houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I hope it is understood that we are now considering legislation that has the small farmer, the medium-sized farmer and the large farmer on the hook. You gentlemen have been planning their economy. At the present time they cannot plant without penalties. You have just voted down an amendment by my colleague from California, Mr. WHITE, which would have protected the little farmer.

Up until last year it was generally understood that this Government wanted people to plant cotton. People throughout the whole United States, but primarily in the West, took their life savings, went out and leveled land, and put down water wells. I would say that 99 percent of them were small farmers. So let us not think we are fooling anyone but ourselves when we talk about 2,000 acre farms. The thing you are talking about now is the farmers throughout the country who for the last 10 years have been put on the hook with a planned economy by this Congress. Call it socialism if you want to, but you are telling them, as they were told by administrative interpretation of the act passed last year, that they are out of business, that they cannot pay their banker.

The gentleman from Texas, whom I admire very much—and I know he has far more experience than I in both agriculture and legislation—should realize, and I cannot refrain from telling him so, that there are some very competent people in California who have their own idea about what constitutes good farming practice. It is probably just as good practice if a man wants to rotate crops to do it on a four-year, a three-year, or even a two-year basis just as good practice as it is to rotate a fractional part of his land every year. If I were a small farmer and wanted to devote 20 acres of my farm to cotton this year, 20 acres to melons next year and 20 acres to maize or some other crop on the third year, that would be considered by many to be good farming practice.

But now you are voting against the people you have on the hook, after you put them on the hook by legislative inducement and penalties. The administration admits that their difficulties result from an administration failure. I have heard members of the committee say that the Department of Agriculture failed to interpret the congressional intent and the intent of the committee. Now, go ahead; but when you do, let it be known here and now that this administration while saying it supports a bill is not supporting it for the small growers of this country. That so-called administrative failure under the 1949 act is the result of inefficiency or lack of attention or deliberate misinterpretation of congressional intention by the Department of Agriculture. They cannot relieve themselves of this burden by passing the buck to State committees who are the political appointees of this administration and the salaried employees of the Department of Agriculture. If this bill even in its present form is filibustered in the Senate, we will see then where the administration stands on it.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WERDEL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WHITE of California. The gentleman came to Washington when the subcommittee on cotton had its meeting to try to alleviate the situation which arose under the existing legislation. He is familiar with the fact that the 50 percent figure was included in the implied promise that went out in the press release of that time. If we vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE], we would be breaking that implied promise, is that not correct?

Mr. WERDEL. I know of no implied promise. I am speaking for people who will be destroyed by the proposed amendment without notice. I want it pointed out that a paternalistic executive department intends that destruction after inducing them to invest their savings and make improvements on lands which are now not to be cultivated because of planned economy.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. WERDEL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUTTON. It is also a fact this amendment was offered in the Committee on Agriculture and was defeated there. I hope it will be defeated on the floor.

Mr. WERDEL. I am not speaking for the Committee on Agriculture. The resolution is a result of a star chamber meeting of a subcommittee. Those of us who crossed the continent were not permitted to attend while the resolution was being discussed for the alleged reason that we were not members of the Agriculture Committee. I discovered later that members of the subcommittee had met on Sunday afternoon in the office of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] which meeting was adjourned to the office of the Secretary of Agriculture at 5 p. m. on that Sunday afternoon. I have been reluctant to say these things until the present hour. I think the time is now here when the small farmer outside of the Old Cotton South should understand that he is expected to make a political contribution to the Fair Deal planned agriculture economy which will be financially destructive to himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. POAGE) there were—ayes 22, noes 28.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 398 relating to cotton and peanut-acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, who art our refuge and strength, we commit ourselves and our Nation to Thee. In these fear-haunted days when violent and vicious forces violate every cherished right which mankind has slowly won, may even ruthless tyranny with its false promises reveal the spiritual glory of true democracy as in Thy name it anew sets up its banners.

Upon all who here labor with full purpose of heart for the purification of public life, for the removal of all that betrays and denies the creed of universal freedom we profess, let Thy blessing rest. Bring us to a golden tomorrow for all Thy children, when the shared plenty of the good earth shall wash the slums of the world into vague, unhappy memories. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MYERS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 30, 1950, was dispensed with.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators may be permitted to submit petitions and memorials, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and present routine matters for the RECORD, without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON STOCK-PILING PROGRAM

A letter from the Chairman of the Munitions Board, Washington, D. C., transmitting, pursuant to section 4 of the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act, Public Law 520, Seventy-ninth Congress, a report on the stock-piling program and a confidential statistical supplement (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

A letter from the Chairman and members of the Atomic Energy Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, the Seventh Semiannual Report of the Commission, dated January 1950 (with an accompanying report); to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

CONDEMNATION OF ALLEGED STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE ACHESON ON ALGER HISS CONVICTION

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi condemning the alleged statements of Secretary Acheson pledging loyalty to Alger Hiss and memorializing Congress to investigate the Department of State and other departments of government, and take such action to rid such departments of all persons who do not measure up to the strictest test of loyalty to the United States, and I ask unanimous consent that I may comment on the resolution for a minute and a half.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received, appropriately referred, and printed in the RECORD, and, without objection, the Senator from Mississippi is recognized for a minute and a half. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, I take this occasion to call attention to the reference the resolution makes to utterances of the Secretary of State, Hon. Dean Acheson, in connection with the conviction of Alger Hiss, as well as to the statements made by Mrs. Roosevelt, an influential citizen of the country and an American delegate to the United Nations.

Mr. President, individuals can adopt whatever position they desire in connection with this matter, but the American public has no sympathy with the unrepentant Alger Hiss. The American people do have sympathy and respect, however, for the man who went into the Garden of Gethsemane and purged and cleansed and purified himself, Whittaker Chambers—a patriotic and contrite man—whose magnificent action in the interest of his country has been measured by the sacrifices that it cost him to atone for his misdeeds and whose only reward is that he can stand on his Maryland farm and look into the face of the rising sun and say: "At long last, thank God, I am an American."

Yes, my sympathy in this case lies not with the unrepentant Alger Hiss but with Whittaker Chambers, a man who sacrificed position, emoluments, and high station to help eradicate the foul nest of treason which he, and only he, could expose and eliminate.

Yes, Mr. President, the apostasy of Whittaker Chambers from communism was a noble act that symbolizes the soul-searching of true greatness.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I am on the side of that New York jury, composed of 12 good men and women, who when confronted with the highest type of evidence known to criminal law—the testimony of a repentant accomplice corroborated by documents and physical facts—did the only thing under God's Heaven they could do. They did their duty and vindicated American jurisprudence throughout the world.

Yes, Mr. President, there are two sides that men can take; but when the history of this troublesome era is written, I venture to say that it will be Whittaker Chambers who will receive the charity and respect of his fellow men which he has so honorably earned and which he so richly deserves.

The resolution of the House of Representatives of Mississippi, presented by Mr. EASTLAND, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House Resolution 11

Resolution condemning alleged statements of Secretary Acheson pledging loyalty to Alger Hiss and memorializing Congress to investigate the Department of State and other departments of Government, and take action to rid such departments of all persons who do not measure up to the strictest test of loyalty to the United States

Whereas the peace, happiness, liberty, and freedom of the people of the United States, and the world at large, are seriously threatened by the gradual but steady march of communism directed from the Soviet Comintern in Moscow; and

Whereas this country has expended billions during the past 4 years and continues to expend billions annually to stop the advance of this deadly enemy to God and to liberty in western Europe and other parts of the world; and

Whereas this gripping monster is well established in the United States, having spread its tentacles until they have invaded some of the departments and institutions of our Government, including the high and important Departments of State, as evidenced by the disclosures and convictions in the trial of Alger Hiss; and

Whereas reports of what happened at Yalta, Tehran, and Potsdam, the sudden change of policy toward China, the unprecedented spectacle of two justices of the Supreme Court of the United States leaving the bench of that august Court to testify as a witness in behalf of one accused of disloyalty to his country and on trial for perjury committed in connection therewith, reinforced by public statements of the Secretary of State and other high officials in support of the accused, and now after two trials and convictions of Alger Hiss of perjury and dishonesty growing out of the charge against him of disloyalty to his country, we witness the shocking and unprecedented statement of the Secretary of State, proclaiming that he is loyal to Hiss as his friend and will stand by him, notwithstanding the fact that he has been convicted of perjury, and proven to be disloyal to the United States by giving aid to a foreign country whose ideologies, policies, and way of life are violently opposed to those of this country and all other freedom-loving countries of the world, and whose rules have declared there is no room in this world for communism and a government of free enterprise, liberty, and freedom such as exists in the United States, therefore, one or the other must be destroyed; and

Whereas for all true Americans, loyalty to country comes first and should be placed above all others, and no man failing to measure up to this test should be entrusted with important affairs of this Government, whether he be an employee or officer, and this is more especially true in the case of one occupying the high and important position of Secretary of State: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi—

That the reported position and statement of Secretary Acheson in relation to Alger Hiss and his conviction, if true, is hereby condemned as a dangerous precedent to the security of this Nation and unbecoming of the occupant of the high and responsible position of Secretary of State.

That the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned and urged to forthwith make a thorough and searching investigation of the personnel of the Department of State and other departments of the Federal Government, including the judiciary, and that summary action be taken to rid these departments of all persons, from the highest to the lowest in rank, who do not measure up to the strictest test of loyalty to this country.

That copies hereof be forwarded to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Senators and Representatives from Mississippi in the Congress of the United States, and to the press.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LONG:

S. 2952. A bill for the relief of Willard Cheek and Louise Cheek; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LEHMAN:

S. 2957. A bill for the relief of Esther Abravanel Acriche; and

S. 2958. A bill for the relief of Alexander M. Lidorikis; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ON NATIONAL HEALTH PROGRAM, 1949

Mr. THOMAS of Utah submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 71), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings conducted before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on S. 1106, S. 1456, S. 1581, and S. 1679, Eighty-first Congress, first session, parts 1 and 2 of the National Health Program, 1949. Such additional copies shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS RELATING TO UTILIZATION OF FARM CROPS

Mr. GILLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 222), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to have printed for its use 900 additional copies of the hearings held before a subcommittee of said committee relative to utilization of farm crops.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LUCAS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. MUNDT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Senate Joint Resolution 2, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE FOREST SERVICE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I submit three amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 5839) to facilitate and simplify the work of the Forest Service, and for other purposes, which is now on the Senate Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments together with a press statement by me explaining the purpose and effect of the amendments, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments submitted by the Senator from Wyoming will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the amendments and statement presented by the Senator from Wyoming will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendments submitted by Mr. O'MAHONEY are as follows:

On page 9, beginning with line 11, strike out through line 9 on page 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 12. Of the moneys received from grazing fees by the Treasury from each national forest during each fiscal year there shall be available at the end thereof when appropriated by Congress an amount equivalent to 2 cents per animal-month for sheep and goats and 10 cents per animal-month for other kinds of livestock under permit on such national forest during the calendar year in which the fiscal year begins, which appropriated amount shall be available until expended on such national forest, under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, for (1) artificial revegetation, including the collection or purchase of necessary seed; (2) construction and maintenance of drift or division fences and stock-watering places, bridges, corrals, driveways, or other necessary range improvements; (3) control of range-destroying rodents; or (4) eradication of poisonous plants and noxious weeds in order to protect or improve the future productivity of the range."

At the end of the bill insert the following new section:

"SEC. . (a) (1) To provide national forest grazing permittees means for the expression of their recommendations concerning the management and administration of national forest grazing lands, a local advisory board shall be constituted and elected as hereinafter provided for each national forest or administrative subdivision thereof whenever a majority of the grazing permittees of such national forest or administrative subdivision so petitions the Secretary of Agriculture. Each elected local advisory board existing for such purpose at the time of the enactment of this act, and recognized as such by the Department of Agriculture, shall continue to be the local advisory board for the unit or area it represents, until replaced by a local advisory board or boards constituted and elected as hereinafter provided.

"(2) Each such local advisory board shall be constituted and elected under rules and regulations, consistent herewith, now or hereafter approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall be recognized by him as representing the grazing permittees of the national forest or administrative subdivision thereof for which such local advisory board has been constituted and elected.

"(3) Each such local advisory board shall consist of not less than 3 nor more than 12 members, who shall be national forest grazing permittees in the area for which such board is constituted, elected, and recognized. In addition, a wildlife representative may be appointed as a member of each such board by the State game commission, or the corresponding public body of the State in which the advisory board is located, to advise on wildlife problems.

"(4) Each such local advisory board shall meet at least once annually, at a time to be fixed by such board, and at such other time or times as its members may determine, or on the call of the chairman thereof or of the Secretary of Agriculture or his authorized representative.

"(b) Upon the request of any party affected thereby, the Secretary of Agriculture, or his duly authorized representative, shall refer to the appropriate local advisory board for its advice and recommendations any matter pertaining to (1) the modification of the terms, or the denial of a renewal of, or a reduction in, a grazing permit, or (2) the establishment or modification of an individual or community allotment. In the event the Secretary of Agriculture, or his duly authorized representative, shall overrule, disregard, or modify any such recommendations he, or such representative, shall furnish in writing to the local advisory board his reasons for such action.

"(c) (1) At least 30 days prior to the issuance by the Secretary of Agriculture of any regulation under this Act or otherwise, with respect to the administration of grazing on National forest lands, or of amendments or additions to, or modifications in, any such regulation, which in his judgment would substantially modify existing policy with respect to grazing in national forests, or which would materially affect preferences of permittees in the area involved, the local advisory board for each area that will be affected thereby shall be notified of the intention to take such action. If as a result of this notice the Secretary of Agriculture shall receive any recommendation respecting the issuance of the proposed regulation and shall overrule, disregard, or modify any such regulations, he or his representative shall furnish in writing to the local advisory board his reasons for such action.

"(2) Any such local advisory board may at any time recommend to the Secretary of Agriculture, or his representative, the issuance of regulations or instructions relating to the use of national forest lands, seasons of use, grazing capacity of such lands, and any other matters affecting the administration of grazing in the area represented by such board."

At the end of the bill insert the following new section:

"SEC. . The Secretary of Agriculture in regulating grazing on the national forests and other lands administered by him in connection therewith is authorized, upon such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, to issue permits for the grazing of livestock for periods not exceeding 10 years and renewals thereof: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as limiting or restricting any right, title or interest of the United States in any land or resources."

The statement presented by Mr. O'MAHONEY is as follows:

PRESS STATEMENT BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY

Following conferences with Forest Service officials and representatives of livestock interests using the national forests for grazing purposes, which started during the closing weeks of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress and continued during the recess and early weeks of the second session, a program designed to improve grazing conditions and administration of the national forests has been agreed upon.

First is the establishment by Executive order, printed in the Federal Register of January 25, 1950, of a National Forest Advisory Board of Appeals to advise the Secretary of Agriculture on appeals to him from the decisions of the Chief of the Forest Service involving any public use of the national forests. This board shall be comprised of five members from any agencies within the Department of Agriculture except the Forest Service. It will be the duty of this board to consider each appeal on its merits and furnish its advice and recommendations to the Secretary.

Conferences which I arranged last week between the Forest Service and a committee of stockmen representing cattle and sheep permittees, I am happy to say, have resulted in agreement on three additional important proposals, which I introduced today as amendments to H. R. 5839, the Granger bill, to facilitate and simplify the work of the Forest Service.

The first amendment is a substitution for section 12 of the above bill and provides that of the grazing fees collected in each national forest, 2 cents per animal-month for sheep and 10 cents per animal-month for other kinds of livestock, when appropriated by Congress, shall be available for range improvements in such forest, such as artificial revegetation, the collection and purchase of seed, construction or maintenance of drift or division fences, bridges, corrals, driveways, and other range improvement, and the control of rodents and the eradication of poisonous plants, to protect and improve the forest ranges.

The second amendment proposes a new section to the bill which establishes a local advisory board of not less than 3 nor more than 12 permittees for each national forest or administrative subdivision thereof when requested by a majority of the grazing permittees. This amendment uses the identical language proposed in a bill, S. 33 of the Eightieth Congress, by Senator MCCARRAN, of Nevada, to establish local advisory boards to provide national forest grazing permittees a means for the expression of their recommendations. These boards are to be elected by the permittees and recognized by the Secretary of Agriculture as representing the grazing permittees of the national forest for which they are elected. A wildlife representative may also be appointed to such board by the State game commission to advise on wildlife problems. These boards are to meet at least once a year at a time fixed by the boards, and at other times determined by the members, or on call of the chairman, or of the Secretary of Agriculture. On the request of any affected party, the Secretary shall refer to these advisory boards for advice and recommendations concerning terms, renewals, and reductions in a grazing permit or the establishment or modification of an individual or community allotment. If the Secretary of Agriculture does not follow such recommendations, he would be required to furnish the local advisory board, in writing, with his reasons. At least 30 days prior to the issuance of any regulation by the Secretary of Agriculture concerning administration of grazing on national forests which modify existing policy or affect the preference of a permittee in the area, the local board for such area will be notified of the intention to take such action and be called upon for recommendations, and these boards may also at any time make recommendations to the Secretary concerning the administration of grazing, seasons of use, grazing capacity, and similar matters in their area.

The third amendment, which I introduced, authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to issue grazing permits and renewals for periods not exceeding 10 years.

I feel that the conferences between Chief Lyle F. Watts and Assistant Chief C. M. Granger, on behalf of the Forest Service, and the committee of stockmen have been most successful. They have formed a pattern of cooperation between the Forest Service and the livestock industry which augurs well for the future.

J. B. Wilson, secretary, Wyoming Wool Growers Association; F. E. Mollin, secretary, American National Live Stock Association; Vernon Metcalf, Nevada; J. M. Jones, secretary, National Wool Growers Association; Floyd Beach, permittee, Uncompahgre Forest, Colo.; Clarence Currey, permittee, Roosevelt Forest, Colo.; Everett Shuey, secretary, Montana Wool Growers Association; Louis Horrell, chairman, Joint Livestock Committee; Frank Mockler, cattle permittee, Wyoming; Radford Hall, assistant secretary, American National Live Stock Association; and John Noh, chairman, forestry committee, National Wool Growers Association, were among the members of the livestock committee who have been working diligently upon this matter here in Washington for the past 2 weeks. I feel that they have done an excellent piece of work.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in addition to the foregoing three amendments, I also submit several technical amendments to House bill 5839, which were all discussed with Chief Forester Watts and his staff, and have the approval of the Forest Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

LETTERS PATENT OF WILLIAM R. BLAIR—NOTICE OF HEARING ON H. R. 577

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Thursday, February 16, 1950, at 10 a. m., in room 424, Senate Office Building, on H. R. 577, to correct possible inequity in the case of a certain application for letters patent of William R. Blair. Persons desiring to be heard should notify the committee by Tuesday, February 14, so that a schedule can be prepared for those who wish to appear and testify. The subcommittee consists of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], chairman, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR].

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the order entered at the time the Senate took a recess yesterday, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is entitled to the floor and is recognized.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I am very happy to associate myself with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and other Senators who are sponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 2, to submit a constitutional amendment proposing a change in our electoral college system.

This subject was discussed at great length in the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives while I had the privilege of being a Member of that body, and I joined with Representative GOSSETT, of the State of Texas, in the sponsorship of a similar joint resolution. I have the very firm conviction that this resolution is one of the best steps for the preservation of our two-party system and for orderly party government in the United States. I believe that this joint resolution should be enacted because it represents what the people for a long time have been thinking they were doing.

Our history is one of reposing more and more responsibility of governing with the people themselves. This has been accomplished by several amendments to the Constitution. The twelfth amendment, adopted 146 years ago, recognized that people should have more responsibility in selecting the President and Vice President. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments extended more duties of citizenship to the people and gave citizenship to many people.

By the seventeenth amendment, the responsibility for the election of United States Senators was transferred from the agents of the people, the members of the State legislatures, to the people themselves. This is a direct precedent for the present issue. This evolution continued when, by the nineteenth amendment, the responsibility of citizenship by franchise was properly extended to American women. Finally, the people claimed more timely control of their elected representatives by ratifying the twentieth, or lame duck, amendment.

The next step in logical sequence is to enable the people to decide whether they are now ready to assume more power and responsibility in the election of the President and Vice President.

The framers of the Constitution seemed not fully to trust the ability of of the people to choose these officials; but by a process of education and exercise of citizenship, the people have rightfully been taking more power into their own hands in connection with the selection of Federal officials. The present question is whether the Congress is now of the opinion that the American people are capable or incapable of having more power in choosing whom they want to be President and Vice President. Certainly, they should be permitted to say whether they wish to take on that responsibility by being permitted to ratify or reject the proposed amendment.

In recent elections, we have seen electors threaten to ignore their moral obligation to vote the wishes of the people who elected them. This was actually carried out in one case. This moral obligation, in my opinion, should be made a legal mandate.

Most American voters think they are voting for the President of their choice when they mark their ballot for the electors designated to cast the electoral votes of their party. Of course, this is not the true situation. The Constitution should be amended to render their feeling about this matter a reality. It seems to me that when for more than a hundred years the people have had the opinion that they are electing their President and Vice President, the Constitution ought to be brought up to date, to put into effect what they think, and have a right to think, they are actually doing.

The possibility that a tragic aftermath may follow the unpopular selection of a President by the electoral college or the House of Representatives has been called vividly to our attention by the 1944 and 1948 elections. Nor is the recognition of the threat to our tranquillity only current.

Chancelor Kent and other students of government pointed out years ago that if we ever experience a revolution or serious difficulty under our system of government, it would probably stem from our method of electing a President.

In this age of rapid media of communication and possession of pertinent information I think we should give our people the opportunity of amending our Constitution to cause the electoral votes to be cast more nearly in proportion to the popular vote. Democracy demands it.

The great advantages of this proposal have been outlined very eloquently and fully by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and other Senators who have interested themselves in this legislation. Very briefly, the points which particularly appeal to me are:

First. The proposal offers protection against a source of real potential danger which stems from the present possibility that the candidate receiving a minority of the popular vote would receive a majority of the electoral vote. This has already happened three times.

Second. It ends the present system whereby the winner in every State effectively gets credited with all the votes, including those which were cast against him.

Third. It ends the present practice of concentrating Presidential politics on those States having the largest population and consequently on the voting minorities in those States.

Fourth. It spreads the presidential campaign and any subsequent presidential political activity into all the 48 States, and spreads the benefits and emoluments of the Federal Government more fairly into all sections.

Fifth. It tends, therefore, politically speaking, to break up so-called solid or one-party areas.

Sixth. It preserves completely the rights of the small States (who still retain the two-vote credit for their two Senators.)

Seventh. It recognizes that the electoral-college system has never functioned as originally conceived by the framers of the Constitution. The so-called electoral college has become a rubber stamp—and an inaccurate rubber stamp at that.

Eighth. It discourages the tendency to select presidential nominees only from among the residents of those States having a large electoral vote.

Ninth. It avoids the possibility, exercised in 91 cases, that State legislatures might intervene and deprive the people of their rightful voice in the selection of the President.

Tenth. It eliminates the need for throwing a presidential election into the House of Representatives where each State, regardless of size, has only one vote. Of course, on one occasion the security of the Nation was threatened by virtue of having an election thrown into the House of Representatives.

Eleventh. It dispells the illusion that a relatively close election was in fact a landslide.

Twelfth. It prevents individual electors from casting votes because of whim or impulse. Under our proposal the electoral vote is retained simply as a counting device.

Thirteenth. It gives our citizens a legal voice in the choice of the President, instead of a mere expression of preference, as under the present system.

Fourteenth. It confers no partisan or sectional advantage.

Mr. President, first of all, the present system is neither fair, honest, accurate, certain, nor democratic. Let me give a few historic illustrations:

In 1912 Woodrow Wilson, with 42 percent of the popular vote, received 82 percent of the electoral vote. In 1936 Roosevelt, with 60 percent of the popular vote, received 98 percent of the electoral vote. In 1940 he received 54 percent of the popular vote and 84 percent of the electoral vote. In 1924 John W. Davis received 6,000,000 popular votes which brought him no electoral votes, while from 2,000,000 other popular votes he received 136 electoral votes. In 1932 Hoover received 15,800,000 popular votes, but over 13,600,000 of them brought him no electoral votes. In 1912 Wilson received 1 electoral vote for each 14,500 popular votes, while Taft received only 1 electoral vote for each 435,000 popular votes.

Second. An undue influence is given to minorities by the present system.

In 1884, in the State of New York, Cleveland got 563,084 votes while Blaine got 562,001 popular votes. A bare 1,000-vote majority in popular votes gave Mr. Cleveland all the electoral votes of the great State of New York. Thus, a change of 600 votes in New York would have elected Blaine President. As has been stated, should a similar situation again arise, as well it might, the Communist Party in the State of New York alone could determine who was to be President of the United States.

Third. Three Presidents who have taken office had a smaller popular vote than did their opponents—Adams in 1824, Hayes in 1876, and Harrison in 1888.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not true, also, that in the case of the Hayes-Tilden campaign, and in the case of the Cleveland-Harrison campaign, no candidate had a majority, and the man who eventually became President did not even have the largest plurality?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I believe the distinguished Senator is correct about that. In the election in 1876, to which the Senator refers—the Hayes-Tilden contest—Hayes polled 4,036,000 votes, and Tilden polled 4,300,000 votes. Yet Mr. Hayes had one more electoral vote, as I remember, than Mr. Tilden had, and was elected President, although Hayes received 264,000 less popular votes than Tilden received.

In 1824, 460,000 popular votes were cast. Andrew Jackson led his nearest opponent, John Quincy Adams, by about 50,000 votes; but because he lacked a majority over his three opponents, Jackson's election was thrown into the House of Representatives. As a result of the manipulations of Henry Clay, Adams—the minority choice—was elected over Jackson for President.

In 1876 occurred the famous Hayes-Tilden contest, which we have been discussing. In that election, 8,336,883 popular votes were cast. Of these, Hayes polled 4,036,298 and Tilden 4,300,590. But because of the archaic electoral-college system, Hayes had a margin of one electoral vote which gave him the Presidency, even though he had received 264,292 less votes than Tilden. In this case, only wise counsel, to which Tilden patriotically contributed by his course of moderation, prevented uprising and possible violence.

In 1888, Grover Cleveland lost the Presidency in spite of the fact that he received more popular votes than Benjamin Harrison. In this election 12,000,000 popular votes were cast. Cleveland received 5,556,543, while Harrison got 5,175,582. Again the minority candidate took office due entirely to the illogical operation of the electoral-college system.

Mr. President, I have enumerated the reasons why many of us think the proposed system will do much to improve our Government and party responsibility. I wish to be a little more specific and to elaborate on two or three of the reasons I am interested in this proposal.

A principal one, from my viewpoint, is that the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment would result in the establishment, on a Nation-wide basis, of the two-party system. Under the present system, if any candidate wins by a plurality of one, the entire electoral vote of the State goes to that candidate. The minority therefore has no voice in the election of the President. The result is that the Democratic and the Republican national organizations—and we all know this to be the case—fight out every Presidential election in a relatively few States. The Republicans tend to mark off the solid South. The Democrats concede that certain New England and Western States will be in the column of the GOP; and virtually no campaign is carried on in those States, which are conceded by either party. The people of the States in the solid South and of the other States which have been marked off do not really participate in the election, because it is understood how the voting in those States will go.

Under the proposed system, the campaign would be carried on in every State, and the issues would be discussed, and every citizen would actually participate in the workings of our democracy.

Yesterday, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] was discussing the fact that in the State of Alabama, where he has lived for 50 years, he has never seen a candidate for President of either of the two principal political parties. That situation is generally true throughout the South. It certainly would be in the interest of better government if the issues of the Presidential campaigns could be discussed by the candidates and by the leading political speakers for the various parties in all the States of the Union. The present situation undoubtedly has something to do with the fact that so few people in the States actually exercise their right of franchise. In some States the number has been as low as 8 or 9 percent in a general election. The difficulty is, of course, that in the South the Republican Party, and in certain of the New England States the Democratic Party, feel there is no use in their making an effort; that they would not have a chance of winning in any event; and, that it is a hopeless fight. But under the system we now propose, by which every vote in such States would count just as much as every vote in some of the so-called pivotal States, we would see a regeneration of interest in both the political parties in all the States of the Union.

Mr. President, the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] has stated that he fears that if this proposal is put into effect, it might result in the formation of a larger number of third or so-called splinter parties. In my opinion it would have exactly the reverse effect. In that connection, I think it is well for us to consider why we have had third or splinter parties.

In the first place, the American people are dedicated generally to the two-party system. They recognize that the best way to operate a democratic form of government is under a strong two-party system, with one party in control of the Government and determining the program and the policies, and the other party being constructively critical of the acts of the majority, trying to improve the program and trying to put forth a better program, so as to capture the votes in the next election, and thereby gain control of the Government.

The general history shows that one of the reasons for the coming into being of third or so-called splinter parties is the feeling in certain sections of the country that the major parties have not given due consideration and due hearing with respect to the problems of those sections, and for that reason they have broken off from the two dominant parties to form parties of their own. That has happened frequently in the history of our country. I think what happened in the last election may be taken as a very good example of why third parties are formed. Certain groups of people in the South felt they were not given proper consideration in the drafting of the Democratic platform. They therefore withdrew, to form the States' Rights Party, not with any hope or expectation of gaining the Presidency, but as a protest against what they felt was an inadequate hearing and consideration by the party. The Progressive Party operated as a separate party because it wanted to register a protest, not with any idea of actually winning the Presidency. This has been true of most of the third-party movements in this country.

I am firmly of the belief that if the two dominant political parties were to feel that they had to make a fight for votes in all sections of the country, and that the votes in South Carolina for the Republican and Democratic parties would count as much as would votes in any of the so-called pivotal States, full hearing and consideration would be given to the particular problems and difficulties and to the position of the people of that State; and similarly, throughout the United States. The election would no longer be dominated merely by the way people voted within a very few States.

Third parties generally have originated, also, not with the idea of winning a substantial number of electoral or popular votes, but with the ambition and aim of wreaking vengeance on one or other of the political parties, and possibly with an ambition to throw the election into the House of Representatives, in which event they would try to see that the party with which they were particularly angry did not receive a sufficient number of votes on a State-by-State basis; which is the way the States vote when an election is thrown into the House of Representatives.

I remember very vividly the arguments used during the last campaign by many of the leading southern newspapers which were supporting the States' Rights efforts. The principal basis upon which people were urged to vote the States' Rights ticket was not the hope of making any great showing or in the belief that there was even a remote chance of obtaining a sufficient number of electoral votes to elect a President. I remember that all the newspapers and a great many of the campaign orators who were supporting the States' Rights movement said the hope was that they would receive a sufficient number of electoral votes to prevent either the Democratic or the Republican Party from obtaining a majority, and that it would therefore throw the election into the House of Representatives, in which event the States' Rights electors would then be in a position to determine the election in the House of Representatives, one way or the other. That was also the burden of the literature distributed by some of those who were supporting the Progressive Party.

Mr. President, Dr. Edward M. Sait has written a very excellent book on American parties and elections. He observes at some length that the real basis and background for most of the third-party efforts are as I have stated them—that is, they are inspired by a desire to get even with those who may have slighted them, or to get even for the lack of recognition given to a particular idea or position in a given section of the country. For instance, speaking of third parties, under the heading, What Dissent Accomplishes, Dr. Sait says:

> Their importance depends, however, not so much upon the size of the popular vote as upon its distribution. When the vote is drawn chiefly from one of the major parties and concentrated in certain States it may disturb that party's combination of sectional interests and even affect the result of a presidential election. Thus Polk won New York and the Presidency in 1844 because the insignificant Liberty Party drew votes from Henry Clay; and Taylor likewise in 1848 because the Free Soil Party drew votes from Lewis Cass. It is possible that Cleveland won New York and the Presidency in 1884 because the Prohibition Party drew votes from James G. Blaine.

It has been said, and I think correctly, that if proper consideration were given to the problems and viewpoints and interests of all sections of the country, there would be a lessening of interest in third parties.

Another thing which has contributed to efforts to create third parties is that in times past certain sections of the country have felt that they had not been fully recognized in the matter of appointments to the President's Cabinet and to other high offices in the Government. It is certainly true that geography plays a very important part in the selection of high officials in the executive branch of the Government. It is only natural, and it always has been, that if those sections which the party in power feels to be safe, regardless of what happens, are not given proper consideration in the selection of Cabinet members, they may become the places where the result of the next election will be decided.

Furthermore, we must all recognize that, merely as the result of our human nature, the emoluments and benefits of Federal projects that might be approved have an important bearing, and that the result of the election or the political situation in a given part of the country may depend to some extent upon the amount of stress or importance given to certain projects.

The pending resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 2, would in my opinion result in a fairer distribution of appointments in the executive branch of the Government throughout the United States. There would not have to be any particular bid to this or that section. Moreover, it would result in a fair distribution of financial emoluments in the way of projects, public improvements, and things of the sort, in which the people are interested.

It was stated by the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] that he felt, if the proposed system were adopted, there would be many minority parties, and the ballot would be crowded with the names of persons running for President, because the fact that they might get one or two electoral votes or a percentage of an electoral vote, instead of receiving merely a certain number of popular votes would afford some encouragement to them. I submit, Mr. President, that if anyone wanted to run for office on the basis of making a showing before the American people—and undoubtedly certain persons have run for the Presidency on the basis of showing what they could do in the way of getting votes—he could make just as much of a showing by the popular votes he obtained. If he got, let us say, 1,000,000 votes or 1,500,000 votes, the showing he made would be just as impressive as if he obtained one, two, or two and a half electoral votes. It is the number of popular votes which a candidate gets that would count in the case of one who wanted to run for office merely for the purpose of showing his ability to get votes. There would be that encouragement.

Then, Mr. President, the States would still determine the method to be followed by a candidate who wanted to get on the ballot in a particular State. In many States a petition containing quite a large number of names is required. The State would still have control of that situation, so as to prevent persons getting on the ballot merely for the purpose of running for some office. But the real test and, I think, the real proof that the passage of the resolution and the adoption of the amendment would not result in as many third parties or splinter parties as there now are is in a comparison of the third parties and splinter parties which have existed in presidential elections in the past with cases in which the electoral-college system has been used and with the number of parties and candidates in the various States in elections for Senators and governors, where, in general elections, the person receiving the highest number of votes is elected Senator or elected governor under the laws of the various States.

Mr. President, I have here the Gallup Political Almanac for 1949, showing the history of presidential elections and senatorial elections. It will be observed that in the year 1948 there were, under the electoral-college system, eight parties having candidates on a Nation-wide basis in the presidential election. This, of course, has resulted in many States listing the numerous electors, so that the ballots have been very confusing.

In the State of Tennessee and, perhaps, in most of the other States, the electors of all the various candidates are listed on the ballots. I can think of no State, and statistics do not show any State, in which, under the plurality system, in the election of a Senator in a general election, there were more than three or four parties, or more than three or four candidates running for the office of Senator.

In the year 1940, in the presidential election, there were candidates of five political parties. In 1936 there were seven political parties. In 1932 there were eight political parties with candidates in the field. In 1928 there were seven political parties. In 1924 there were approximately 14 political parties, but they worked out consolidations so that only 8 were represented on the final ballot. In 1920 there were seven political parties.

In examining the various campaigns for the Senate during those years it will be found that if a person wanted to run for office merely for the purpose of making a showing he could get his name on the ballot very easily, or if the various parties wanted to have candidates merely for the purpose of making a showing in a senatorial election, they could get their candidates' names on the ballot. I think it will be found that in no State and in no year have there been as many candidates for the office of United States Senator as there were parties in a general election under the electoral-college system.

Mr. President, it has been stated that this proposal would infringe upon the sovereignty or the rights of the States. It should be emphasized that the constitutional amendment proposed by the resolution in no way disturbs the jurisdiction and authority of the States over franchises and elections. The proposed amendment in no way interferes with State sovereignty or the rights of States to specify the qualifications of voters or the manner in which they shall vote or have their votes counted. It leaves the ballot boxes entirely within the control of the States.

As I pointed out earlier, the right of a State to require whatever it may wish with reference to a candidate's name being put on a ballot in the particular State is not disturbed.

Some persons have claimed — and there are some amendments offered in that connection—that the amendment proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 2 does not go far enough. They concede that the electoral college should be abolished, that it has not functioned as was intended by the founding fathers, and that in an effort to give greater power to the people we should elect Presidents on a Nation-wide basis by popular vote instead of dividing the electoral votes in proportion to population in the various States.

There are, of course, many answers to that particular argument. To do away with the electoral vote and substitute instead a direct popular vote would make national campaigns a matter of complete national control. It would do away altogether with State lines in presidential elections. It would reduce voting within the States to the lowest common denominator. For example, the State of Georgia has an 18-year voting age. All States, to be on a parity with Georgia, would have to reduce their voting age to 18 years under an absolute, direct popular vote.

Again, under such a system, sectionalism would be aggravated rather than lessened. In a sectional controversy it would become a contest of gathering up the greatest volume of votes in a particular area for the purpose of out-voting some other particular area. Furthermore, the direct popular vote would open up the small-State large-State controversy. As a practical matter, no such amendment would ever secure ratification by the necessary number of States because relatively small or sparsely settled States far outnumber the others. Those States would not give up the slight advantage they have through the number of electoral votes accorded them under the Constitution.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say that this proposal has been very extensively discussed in the high schools and colleges throughout the United States during the past 2 years. During last year it was the subject of high-school debate under the auspices of the association which tries to direct, guide, and make suggestions for high-school debating societies. The question has been widely discussed in the editorial columns of newspapers all over the United States. Generally the press and the people have a feeling that if we are to have a sound democracy, something must be done toward revitalizing our two-party system so as to give the voters a choice as between parties and to place the two-party system on a national instead of on a sectional basis. I can think of nothing more important for the welfare of the Nation than bringing about that situation. In the opinion of most of the students of government, political scientists, and editors of newspapers, as well as other persons who are well informed on public affairs, the passage of this resolution and the adoption of the amendment it proposes would be the greatest step that could be taken toward that end. It is a question which has been very fully presented to the American people. All the polls have shown that the people, regardless of political parties, favor this proposal. So, in the interest of giving the people themselves an opportunity, through proper constitutional means, of strengthening the Federal Government and the two-party system, I feel that the Senate and the House of Representatives should submit this constitutional amendment to the States, and I urge the Members of the Senate to do so.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. As I understood the distinguished Senator, he said the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 2 would have a tendency to eliminate or to minimize splinter parties. I wonder if the Senator would be good enough to explain the theory which is behind his philosophy.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I shall be very happy to. That is my very definite opinion. Undoubtedly the statistics show that there are always more candidates for President in the various States, under the electoral-college system, than there are candidates for the Senate. The election of a President, of course, is under the electoral-college system, while the election of a Senator is under a plurality system.

The particular reasons why I think that would be the result are that third parties have always grown up, first, because of the feeling of the people in a particular section of the country that in the two principal parties they were not given a full hearing or consideration of their particular problems, but rather were ignored because the leaders of the party felt it did not make much difference what happened in that section, for they would either get the votes anyway, or could not get them in any event; so they did not have to give much consideration to that section. That according to all the text books, is the principal reason for the development of third parties in the history of our country.

That attitude, of course, would be much less pronounced, if not entirely eliminated, if the proposed amendment to the Constitution were put into effect, because a vote in any State, South Carolina or Mississippi, for instance, would count just as much as a vote in one of the pivotal States, and both parties would fight just as hard for the votes. So necessarily they would be very anxious to consider and to take into account the problems of the people in all sections.

The second great reason for the creation of third parties, according to the political scientists and historians, is the desire to wreak vengeance on the party which a group of people feel has done them injustice. They feel that they have been wronged by one or the other of the political parties, and they are going to see what they can do by trying to pull enough votes away from the party at which they are angry in order to throw the election into the House of Representatives. That was the advertised purpose of the States' Rights Party in the last general election. That was the burden of a great deal of the literature which was disseminated. So of course that reason would be removed.

The third reason for the formation of third parties has been the feeling on the part of a certain section that it has not been recognized in the appointment of top administrators or Cabinet members in the executive department, or that it has not been recognized in connection with some public improvement, or perhaps in programs which might be good for farming interests, or fishing interests, or for mining interests, and therefore a third party is formed.

I am certain that under the proposed system full consideration would be given by both political parties to such particular interests in all sections, although they would not reach the same solution, of course. Therefore we would have the people all over the country coming into one or the other of the two principal political parties.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I thank the distinguished Senator, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending joint resolution, and ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

On the 6th day of January following the election, unless the Congress by law appoints a different day not earlier than the 4th day of January and not later than the 10th day of January the.

On page 3, line 10, beginning with the words "the person" strike out all down to and including line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be President, if such number be at least 40 percent of the whole number of such electoral votes. If no person have at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then from the persons having the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President, the Senate and the House of Representatives, sitting in joint session, shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. A majority of the votes of the combined authorized membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall be necessary for a choice.

On page 3, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following:

The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

On page 3, beginning with line 20, strike out all down to and including line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution, the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, and section 4 of the twentieth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two with respect to the amendment. I invite the attention of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

It seems to me that this amendment would give considerable strength to the joint resolution sponsored by the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators proposing a constitutional amendment providing for the abolition of the electoral college.

In the first place, the first part of the amendment specifically says:

On the 6th day of January following the election, unless the Congress by law appoints a different day not earlier than the fourth day of January and not later than the tenth day of January.

That specifically gives to the new Congress coming in, rather than the old Congress which is voted out on November 5, the right to make the determination. To me that is a very important point, because certainly the new Congress coming in on January 5, rather than the old Congress, which is voted out on November 5, should have the power and the right to do the things set forth in the proposed constitutional amendment.

The situation I have in mind is that between November 5 and January 6 a defeated President could call a special session of the old Congress and, unless the amendment offered by me were adopted, the old Congress could act before the new Congress was sworn in on January 6.

The next point involved is in line with the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], which provides that—

The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be the President, if such number be at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes.

As was stated yesterday, in my opinion this amendment if agreed to will help do away with the formation of so-called splinter parties. I think the amendment provides a safeguard and should be added to the proposed constitutional amendment.

It will be noticed that in my amendment it is provided that—

If no person have at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then from the persons having the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President, the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

Yesterday we talked about persons having the three highest numbers of electoral votes cast for President. My amendment proposes to change that so as to cover only the persons having the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President. I believe that is an improvement because under my amendment there can be no deadlock in voting with respect to the selection of the President, for if there are only two from whom to make the selection, it is inevitable that a majority vote will be had by either one or the other of them.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader a question. As I understand the amendment, one of its provisions is that the successful candidate shall receive at least 40 percent of the electoral votes.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. There has been considerable debate regarding this matter, and this is one of the points concerning which I have tried to reach a decision as to whether the so-called Lodge amendment will eliminate splinter parties or whether it may be conducive to the creation of splinter parties.

In view of the fact that the Senator from Illinois has offered an amendment providing that the successful candidate shall receive at least 40 percent of the entire number of electoral votes, with the idea that such a provision may eliminate so-called splinter parties, is there any doubt in the Senator's mind that the constitutional amendment proposed by the joint resolution as introduced will create splinter parties?

Mr. LUCAS. I debated that point yesterday, and said that in my opinion it possibly would produce splinter parties.

On the other hand, it seems to me my amendment would have a tendency to cure that defect, if there is that defect in the so-called Lodge amendment. Of course, that is speculation upon my part, just as the opinions of other Senators were speculative. But I believe it is permissible speculation in this case.

Since the Senator from Nebraska has raised that question, I should like to interject into the debate the thought that there is another way in which splinter parties can be minimized, namely, by the action of the individual State legislatures. I wish to state for the RECORD what has happened in the State of Illinois with respect to the formation of third parties overnight, so to speak. Some 4 years ago the Illinois Legislature passed a bill which provides that before a new party can get on the ballot in Illinois a petition must be circulated, and the petition must have, as I recall, 25,000 signatures, 50 counties of the State must be represented among those signatures, and each of the 50 counties must be represented by the signatures of at least 200 registered and valid voters, in order to make the petition valid as a whole.

That law was tested in the last campaign by Henry Wallace, when he ran for President of the United States. The petition filed by him in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Illinois was objected to, and the canvassing board of the State of Illinois sustained the objection. Appeals were taken, finally reaching the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court held that the Illinois law was constitutional. I bring this into the debate only to show that if State legislatures are as troubled about splinter parties as I know a number of Senators are, including the Senator from Nebraska and myself, there is a method which can be employed, and which has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, which will almost prohibit a third party from sprouting unless it has a tremendous amount of strength throughout the Nation, from getting on the ballot in a State. I should say that any new party which springs up and which can comply with the provisions of the Illinois law, is entitled to just recognition. At the same time, under that law the two-party system is well protected.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. IVES. I should like to inquire of the able Senator from Illinois whether Illinois also has a requirement, other than the method he has indicated; in other words, whether there is also a different requirement, one by which candidates of a third or other party, can be permitted to have their names placed on the ballot. I speak of a requirement based on the number of votes cast in a previous gubernatorial election. In the State of New York there is a requirement that, in order to retain its place on the ballot, a party's candidate for governor must have received a minimum number of votes. As I recall, this number is 50,000 votes. We also have the petition method for the same purpose.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct. We also have such a law in Illinois. But the new law, passed 4 or 5 years ago, pertains particularly to new parties, not to parties which have been in existence in the past and have been able to comply with the 5-percent provision.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, let me say that New York has a similar law, as I have indicated; but as an alternative requirement, the State of New York requires that no party can have the name of its candidates appear on the State-wide ballot in a subsequent election unless its candidate for governor in the previous election has received a minimum number of votes.

Mr. LUCAS. We have a similar law in Illinois.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader whether he can tell us how he arrived at the 40-percent requirement. I do not mean that the requirement should be arrived at on a statistical basis, but I am wondering what impact the requirement of 40 percent of the electoral votes would have on the proposed constitutional amendment. Would it have a tendency to discourage the achievement of the purposes for which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts made such a forceful argument, or would party workers be encouraged to become active in elections, regardless of that requirement?

Mr. LUCAS. I think it would definitely encourage, rather than discourage. I think it certainly would encourage favorable votes for the resolution on the floor of the United States Senate, and that is the main thing we are interested in just now.

Mr. WHERRY. If that be the case, then I suppose the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is in accord with this amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. I have talked informally with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts about the amendment, and I think he is about ready to tell the Senate and the country that he will accept it.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield now to the Senator from Massachusetts to permit him to reply.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, let me say to my able friend, the Senator from Illinois, that Senate Joint Resolution 2, as reported and as now before the Senate, does not touch, one way or another, the essentials of the present system, insofar as concerns candidates who receive a plurality of the popular vote. We did not seek to change that part of the present system because we did not think it had worked badly in the past. It is true that there have been 12 Presidents who have received only a plurality, rather than a majority, of the popular vote. The names of those 12 Presidents have been stated for the RECORD. They include Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, and Harry S. Truman. It has never been apparent that there was anything wrong or dangerous about having a man become President if he had received a plurality of the popular vote, rather than a majority of the vote. In this amendment we were trying to cure the defects which caused the system to work badly; we were not trying to touch anything which had worked well. For that reason, we did not include this provision.

But I think this provision is a good one. In my opinion, it puts a floor under the situation. I believe it settles once and for all any doubt in anyone's mind in regard to whether this proposal will increase the danger of the formation of splinter parties. Certainly when it comes to a final decision between two candidates, before a new Congress, the splinter parties will be completely eliminated.

I have said many times on this floor in the last few days that I do not consider that Senate Joint Resolution 2, as it stands, encourages splinter parties. On the contrary, I think it discourages them, because it removes the great power they have had in the past to throw the entire vote of a State one way or the other. But the amendment which the Senator from Illinois offers certainly conclusively and utterly sweeps away any doubt which might exist in anyone's mind as to whether the proposal encourages splinter parties, and, so, for all those reasons, speaking for myself, I am very glad to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I very much appreciate the Senator's remarks, but this is the first time—and I have listened to most of the debate, though not all of it, but have read what I did not listen to—it seems to me, a doubt is raised as to splinter parties. I again ask, why should 40 percent be decided on? If 40 percent will encourage workers and will eliminate splinter parties, why not raise it to 45 percent or to some other percentage? If it is going to encourage workers to fix it at 40 percent, and if it will not encourage splinter parties, why stop at 40 percent?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WHERRY. I am merely asking the question.

Mr. LODGE. There is of course an obvious answer. I am not the author of the amendment. The Senator from Illinois can doubtless defend it better than can I, but there is one answer which occurs to me. It is that if the percentage becomes too high, every election will end in the House of Representatives.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. If I may continue for a moment on that point, I may say I am not so much worried about what the Congress would do, but all I am trying to find out is what will happen in the event the amendment is adopted. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further? I am talking in his time.

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad to yield further to the minority leader.

Mr. WHERRY. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has contended that it will eliminate splinter parties, and therefore, that is one of the reasons why we should pass the resolution. What has been bothering me is the question of splinter parties. Some say the proposed constitutional amendment will prevent or discourage splinter parties; others say it will create splinter parties. As I read the testimony, and as I read the observations made, that is one problem. Now comes the amendment to establish a floor of 40 percent. It seems to me it is sensible, in the way in which it is framed, but to my mind it immediately raises a doubt that it may create splinter parties. The force of the amendment, to me, is not so much its effect in taking out of the hands of Congress the decision of an election as its effect in stopping splinter parties from coming in under certain pressure. They should not thereby win an election. Therefore, a ceiling of 40 percent is suggested.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will yield, I think I can explain to my able friend from Nebraska why it is that the proposed amendment would make it more difficult than it has ever been in our history to have splinter parties. In fact, after listening to the Senator from Nebraska on the floor in the past few days, it seems to me the amendment is exactly the thing that will take care of all the doubts expressed by him, because it brings it down to a choice between the two highest candidates; and if we are going to have that kind of choice, where is there any opportunity for a splinter party? If the amendment of the Senator from Illinois does not take care of the doubts of the Senator from Nebraska, I do not know what will. In fact, when I decided to express my approval of the amendment, I had in mind in part the Senator from Nebraska, because I thought the amendment embodied a provision which would bring his wholehearted acceptance of the proposal.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield so that I may reply to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LUCAS. I am very glad to have the Senator respond, if he can.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator mean, if I am physically able, or mentally able?

Mr. LUCAS. I mean if the Senator can answer it.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not trying to answer anything, because I did not ask the question with an idea of getting into a discussion about the merits of the joint resolution or the force of the amendment. I deeply appreciate the observations made by the Senator from Massachusetts, to the effect that he had me in mind when he accepted the amendment. It is one of the highest compliments ever to have been paid me on the floor of the Senate.

I think, however, my question will be repeated by a great many party workers. I think it is a very direct question. I may say to the distinguished majority leader that the fact he offers the amendment indicates to me there is some apprehension about splinter parties. Until this moment, I was led to believe that the constitutional amendment as proposed by joint resolution would be conducive to the elimination of splinter parties; in fact, I was going along on that theory. We now have an amendment which says, "In order to erase any doubt from your mind, we will provide a floor of 40 percent of the electoral vote."

Mr. LODGE. Surely the Senator from Nebraska does not object to my trying to meet his criticism.

Mr. WHERRY. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. Even though I do not think his criticism is well founded.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator has a perfect right to do that. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has a right to endeavor to meet my criticism. However, I did not rise at this particular time to criticize anything. Believe it or not, I am open-minded on the question of the passage of the resolution. But I certainly felt that the presentation by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was made on the basis that the joint resolution introduced by him would eliminate splinter parties. We now have an amendment offered by the distinguished majority leader to raise the floor to 40 percent, which I think will accomplish the purpose for which the majority leader has offered it.

My next question was, Why make it 40 percent? Was that too much of a penalty? Was it too high a floor? How was the 40 percent determined? If 40 percent is conducive to the elimination of splinter parties, why not increase the percentage? That seems to me to be a very simple question.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Nebraska may offer an amendment, if he desires, to increase the percentage. Forty percent seemed to be a reasonable figure. I think the Senator from Massachusetts answered the question a moment ago. It is possible to place the percentage so high that every election will go to the House of Representatives. We are trying if possible to get away from contests in the House of Representatives.

I am offering the amendment on the theory that it will eliminate the rise of splinter parties. That is the reason for it. The Senator from Massachusetts believes that his joint resolution as originally introduced is sufficient, and that it will not encourage splinter parties. I have some apprehension about that. I believe the amendment is in the right direction, at least, and I believe it to be a proper and a constructive amendment, and that it can in nowise impair the basic proposition involved in the original joint resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, there has been some skepticism about what is going to happen to the joint resolution. My good friend from Nebraska said a moment ago he was open-minded about my amendment. When the Senator is open-minded about a proposition of this kind, it makes me a little bit skeptical. I hope he will close his mind in the direction of supporting my amendment, because he and I are attempting to do the same thing.

There is no point in the Senator from Nebraska asking why it should have been 39 percent or 41 percent or 42 percent, or some other percentage. That is not the point. He and I are trying to accomplish the same thing. The Senator from Massachusetts, although he does not believe our criticism to be valid, is nevertheless attempting to meet the criticism by accepting the amendment. I feel satisfied that when the Senator from Nebraska goes over the amendment carefully and studies it, he will go along with me, because he is always anxious to cooperate, even on important problems; and this is an important problem.

Mr. WHERRY and Mr. FERGUSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to assure the distinguished majority leader that, as usual, I am ready to cooperate with him. I think that is evidenced by the good faith of my actions on the Senate floor during the time the Senator from Illinois has been the majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. I would not go that far.

Mr. WHERRY. I hope the Senator will go as far as he can.

Mr. LUCAS. I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. It was the Senator from Illinois who raised this point in my mind as to the growth of splinter parties, and his amendment now raises a doubt in my mind. I thank him for offering the amendment and for his observations on it. I have wondered if the figure which the Senator from Illinois has placed in his amendment was arrived at because of some showing made by some splinter party or some combination of parties. I should like to know why he selected the figure of 40 percent. I wondered whether it might be higher or lower and still accomplish the desired purpose.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not know that I can answer any further than I have done already. I think the question has been answered two or three times. I should like to recall to the memory of the Senator from Nebraska that the late Senator Norris offered an amendment providing for 35 percent. It was discussed yesterday by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. But either 35 or 40 percent would cover the situation.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief observation. I think it is generally recognized that there should be reform in the procedure of electing a President of the United States. I think reform is overdue. I generally favor the objectives of the pending amendment. I think it would probably give a more complete, full, and fair expression of the American people in making their choice for President. I am one of those Senators, and there are others in this body, who have some apprehension with regard to the provision that whoever shall receive the most votes shall become President of the United States. I feel that there should be some floor established. I cannot definitely foresee any time in the future when possibly 25 percent, 21 percent, or 31 percent, for instance, would elect. But, certainly, in the enactment of basic law in amendments to our Constitution we should try to anticipate every contingency which could arise.

I think this is a very safe provision. I do not know whether the percentage should be 40 or 41, or what should be the floor established, provided we can know that below a certain percentage the sentiments and expressions of the people of the country cannot name a President of the United States.

I think this amendment is a safeguard, and I am very pleased that the majority leader has offered it. I understand that the able author of the resolution is willing, although he thinks it is perhaps unnecessary, to accept the amendment.

If the distinguished majority leader will yield further, I should like to say that with this further amendment I can support the resolution. I had serious doubts about it, but I think that in its general purpose and objective it will be quite an improvement and a progressive step in the manner of choosing a President of the United States.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. In a moment. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for the contribution he has made. It is a good one. I wholeheartedly agree with him that there should be a figure of at least 40 percent. If this amendment is agreed to and the voters of the country are aware of the provision, as they will be, it will have a tendency to keep the two-party system instead of making it possible to have a dozen parties. I can see how 11 percent of the votes might elect a President of the United States. That possibly will never happen, but if we should follow in this country what has been done in other countries, such as France and Greece, we would have a very bad situation. In Greece I understand there are 80 parties. It can be understood what would happen if that situation should occur in this country. There might be 10 or 12 different parties in the House and Senate. There would be no majority; there would be instability; there would be no responsibility; there would be a general disintegration of the American system of Government. I think my amendment would be a great protection against such a situation.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall yield first to the Senator from Michigan. He has been on his feet for some time.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, this is not the same kind of amendment which was offered in 1934. It still provides for a plurality. I think the Senator has adopted the method which I proposed yesterday, that the Members of the Senate and of the House should vote in case of a deadlock. I have always thought that was a good thing.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the method provided for in the amendment. It is different from the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. FERGUSON. It is the same as that which the Senator from Michigan proposed in his amendment. But I do not think it meets the real nub of the situation, because it allows the splintering of parties down to 40 percent. We would be going across State lines and determining the unit vote on the national plane, which, in the opinion of the junior Senator from Michigan, would mean that we would be bound to have splinter parties. We would be bound to weaken party organizations, and the issues which make parties would be narrowed down. Under the present two-party system there is a broad issue, a national issue, or a group of issues, so that we have something for the various sections of the Nation on which the voters can come together and decide on a President.

I shall have something further to say on the question at a later time.

Mr. LUCAS. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for permitting me to make some observations. I had intended to emphasize the point to which the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] just referred, in connection with lodging in the Congress the decision on any election in which no candidate has received as much as 40 percent of the votes cast.

With reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, I should like to ask the able Senator a question. On the basis of his amendment, how large a vote does the Senator from Illinois consider to be required in electing a President from the two highest candidates? Is the required number 266, which is a majority of the combined membership of the two Houses, or is it something else? The Senator from New York thinks this is an important point.

Mr. LUCAS. The amendment reads:

> A majority of the votes of the combined authorized membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall be necessary for a choice.

I would say it would take 266 votes.

Mr. IVES. In that connection, Mr. President, the Senator from New York would like to observe that that is in the language in the statute which provides the method for adopting the Presidential reorganization plans, under which a majority of the authorized membership of each House of the Congress is required. That is where the language comes from, as I understand, and I think it should be definitely understood that in voting for the pending proposal that is what we have in mind, 266 votes.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not think there can be any doubt about that, and I am glad the Senator from New York raised the question. The amendment as originally offered would not have had that effect. That was discussed with the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday. The Senator from New York is right in his conclusion as to what this section of the amendment means. In my judgment it means 266 votes.

Mr. IVES. The Senator from New York thanks the able Senator from Illinois, and if the Senator from Illinois will yield another moment while the Senator from New York makes another observation——

Mr. LUCAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. IVES. The Senator from New York does not desire to have the Senator yield the floor, because the Senator from Massachusetts and I may desire to ask the Senator from Illinois questions. If the Senator will keep the floor for a moment until I make a statement, I will appreciate it. It deals directly with the observation just made by the Senator from Illinois.

Regarding the matter of splinter parties—and I only wish the able Senator from Nebraska were present—I represent a State where there probably is as much trouble with splinter parties as is to be found in any other State in the Union. After looking at the amendment as it is now amended, with the safeguard of 40 percent, I am satisfied that there will be no more incentive for splinter parties in the State of New York than now exists, under the present statutes.

I desire to point out, however, that no matter what kind of change we make in our constitutional procedure dealing with the question of the election of President and Vice President, we are not going to find absolute perfection. It is going to be a matter of trial and error. It seems to me the test we should apply in this connection is primarily this: Is the proposed plan better than what we now have? With the additional safeguard—or these safeguards as they really are—I believe this is a distinctly better procedure than anything which to my knowledge has thus far been proposed and it is a vast improvement over the present constitutional provision.

I thank the able Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I yield, if the Senator wishes to ask a question.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to ask a question.

Mr. LUCAS. Then I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Yesterday, in the course of his able address, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] argued that when people in the South decided to leave the Democratic Party they did not go to the Republican Party, but that they went to the Dixiecrat Party, and he asserted in a very emphatic way that that is exactly what happened in 1948.

Following the able Senator's remarks I made a little study, and I found that in the Southern States Governor Dewey received 1,867,189 votes, and Thurmond received 1,003,769 votes. In other words, of the total number, Dewey got 65 percent and Thurmond got 35 percent. Dewey received 863,420 more votes in the Southern States than did Thurmond in in spite of the fact that the Republicans had very little organization in those States, and had no incentive whatever to get out the votes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I do not agree with the Senator at all. The Republicans made a very vigorous campaign in many States. In others they did not. I do not know what States the Senator has included. Did he include the 11 Southern States?

Mr. LODGE. I included Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, Tennessee, and Kentucky.

Mr. TAFT. Kentucky I would hardly count. We usually count Kentucky as a border State. Leaving out Kentucky, the situation was entirely different in the several States. In some States Thurmond was not even a candidate.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct.

Mr. TAFT. In other States Dewey was not, for practical purposes, a candidate. Therefore the Senator cannot draw any over-all conclusion from the results in the 11 Southern States.

Mr. LODGE. I think I was as much justified in drawing a conclusion my way as was the Senator from Michigan in drawing a conclusion his way.

The Senator from Michigan said yesterday, "What did they do? They went to the Dixiecrats," as an argument for contending that if Senate Joint Resolution 2 were enacted, the Republicans would get no benefit. I was as justified in making the opposite assertion as he was in making his. Facts are facts, and the fact is that in the States I have named, Dewey received 863,420 more votes than did Thurmond. That is a fact. The Senator from Ohio cannot gainsay facts. Certainly if the proposed amendment were in the Constitution, the Republicans would be much better organized in the South than they are now, and they would have a much greater incentive to work and get out the vote than they have now. That, it seems to me, is an argument.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table to which I have referred be printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Analysis of the Dewey-Thurmond vote in 13 Southern States, 1948 elections

State	Popular vote
	Dewey	Thurmond
Alabama	26,713	132,073
Arkansas	40,236	34,987
Florida	180,837	84,208
Georgia	69,992	81,730
Louisiana	63,647	176,827
Mississippi	3,661	109,133
North Carolina	220,693	63,224
Oklahoma	268,817	----------
South Carolina	5,337	93,143
Texas	281,673	104,126
Virginia	172,649	42,426
Tennessee	191,396	72,192
Kentucky	341,540	9,700
Total	1,867,189	1,003,769

Dewey received 863,420 more votes than Thurmond in these States. In other words, Dewey got 65 percent and Thurmond got 35 percent.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator feel that if this proposed amendment were added to the Constitution it would be necessary for the Federal Government to pass election laws which would provide that every candidate for President should file in every State in the South, for instance? Would not that be required, necessarily, in order that any advantage might accrue from the point of view of the Republican Party? In effect, is not the Senator urging that we have a Federal law permitting the Republican Party to go on the ballot in every State, and regulating from Washington the manner in which all national elections for President shall be conducted, from the time of the primary until the final election?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not think so. The Senator from Michigan asked the same question, on March 11, 1949, as appears on page 71 of the hearings. This was the question of the Senator from Michigan:

> If a constitutional amendment were adopted, guaranteeing electoral votes to every candidate according to popular votes, would candidates be likely to argue that States must put them on the ballot since Presidential elections are now Federal and not State contests? In other words, would Federal regulation of Presidential elections be likely to follow, to protect the right of the candidate to his share of the popular vote? Why grant him an electoral share if States can keep him off the ballot?

The answer which I gave was as follows:

> This question rests, in my opinion, upon a misunderstanding of what the proposed constitutional amendment provides. Section 1 states that—
> "Each person for whom votes were cast for President in each State shall be credited with such proportion of the electoral votes thereof as he received of the total vote of the electors therein for President."
> This simply provides how the electoral votes will be counted. It does not, as the question implies, "guarantee" electoral votes to any candidate. It merely provides that if he receives popular votes in a State, he shall be credited with a corresponding proportional share of the electoral vote of that State. There is no more reason to believe that candidates will demand inclusion of their names on State ballots under the procedure here recommended than under the present system. The phrase in the question which reads: "since Presidential elections are now Federal and not State contests" is somewhat misleading. Elections under the proposed reform are "Federal" only in the strictly limited sense that the electoral votes which a candidate receives in a State where he failed to command a plurality of the popular vote are added to the electoral votes received in other States. But the State control of election laws is completely untouched.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator feel, however, that we would be obliged to move into a State like South Carolina, for example, and pass laws to compel the State to permit the Republicans to place candidates on a fair ballot and receive fair treatment?

Mr. LODGE. What does the Senator mean when he says "move in"?

Mr. TAFT. By Federal law, by Federal legislation.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. TAFT. Absolutely. If we are going to give effect to a proposal to abolish the one-party State, I cannot imagine how we can permit South Carolina, or North Carolina, for that matter, to continue practices in which they now indulge and which for all practical purposes preclude the Republicans from voting in those States. Since every additional vote will count if the Senator's proposal is adopted, will we not be forced to enact Federal legislation which will give every party the right in every Southern State to be represented on the ballot fairly and squarely, so that every party can obtain every vote to which it is entitled?

Mr. LODGE. We are not proposing to abolish the one-party State. We are not proposing to do that.

Mr. TAFT. Well——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator permit me to finish?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. What we are proposing to do under the constitutional amendment is to create an opportunity for the people to do away with one-party States if they want to, and if they want to badly enough, I presume they can exert sufficient pressure in the State legislatures to make whatever changes in the State law are necessary. I do not at all understand the reasoning of the Senator from Ohio, or his suggestion that the Federal Government will have to move in on the Southern States. I think that is very farfetched.

Mr. TAFT. The Republican Party received about 3 percent of the vote in South Carolina. Why? Because of the way the ballot is set up.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. TAFT. I have received many applications from South Carolina urging us to make efforts to have proper Republican representation on the ballot. There has not heretofore been any great incentive because of the feeling that probably nothing can be accomplished, and the Republicans cannot carry South Carolina anyway. But if every vote is going to count, it seems to me Federal legislation will be required in order to see to it that every State gives a fair deal to every candidate for President of any of the leading parties.

Mr. LODGE. The reason we do not carry South Carolina is not because of the way the ballot is set up.

Mr. TAFT. I merely suggest that is the reason why we receive only 3 percent of the vote.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that is the reason at all. I think the reason why we do not do better in South Carolina is because everyone knows our case there is hopeless, for even if we do make every effort to get out the vote, the effort is wasted because the additional vote that is thus gotten out will not be added to what the Republicans receive elsewhere.

I think that to say that the result could be changed if a Federal law were written, as the Senator suggests, is similar to attempting to cure a man of the smallpox by rubbing his face with facial cream. I think that would be treating the shadow for the substance.

Mr. President, yesterday some discussion occurred as to the question of the plurality of the popular vote. I have already placed information in the RECORD, which was printed the other day, showing that there have been elected 12 Presidents who received only a plurality rather than a majority of the popular vote: Polk, Taylor, Buchanan, Lincoln, Hayes, Garfield, Cleveland, Harrison, Cleveland, Wilson, Wilson, and Truman.

Since that time, in response to questions by certain Senators I have examined the figures of the 1948 election in States where the candidate who carried 100 percent of the electoral vote of the States did so with less than a majority of the popular vote. In response to the questions which have been asked of me I ask unanimous consent to have the table published in the RECORD. I may say that the list includes California, Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Tennessee, and Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Without objection it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

In the following 11 States in the 1948 presidential election, the candidate who carried the State did so with less than a majority of the popular vote:

State	Total popular vote	Popular vote for candidate carrying the State	Percentage of popular vote
California	4,021,538	1,913,134	47.6
Florida	577,643	281,988	48.8
Indiana	1,656,214	821,079	49.6
Louisiana	416,336	204,290	49.1
Maryland	596,735	294,814	49.4
Michigan	2,109,609	1,038,595	49.2
New York	6,177,337	2,841,163	46.5
Ohio	2,936,071	1,452,791	49.5
Oregon	524,080	260,904	49.8
Tennessee	550,283	270,402	49.1
Virginia	419,256	200,786	47.9

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Of course, in considering the proposed constitutional amendment we should look backward and consider the facts as they are. As I understand the Senator, if the amendment had been in effect, and the plurality method had been used, the result might have been different. But on the basis of the actual facts and the actual populations of the States, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator a question. Would the results really have been any different in the election of a President if the proposed amendment to the Constitution sponsored by the Senator from Massachusetts had been the procedure whereby the election would have been decided?

Mr. LODGE. Of course, in every presidential election the result would have been different. It is simply inconceivable that it could not have been. The candidate might even have been a different candidate. Certainly the issues would have been different, and certainly the conduct of the campaign would have been different.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Perhaps the Senator misunderstood my question. I do not believe he answered the question I asked him. I am assuming that the electors who were elected in the presidential election would have gone to the electoral college and voted in accordance with the way the people voted. All I am asking is, if the formula under the constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator had been in existence, let us say, back in 1860, how could there then have been any difference in the vote that was cast in the electoral college if it had been cast under the so-called Lodge amendment, rather than under the machinery then and now in existence?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean, assuming the people had voted the same way?

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think they would have voted the same way. I think that would be as unusual as five royal flushes in a row. It is simply incredible to me that that could happen. But if the Senator wants to take the new rules and apply them to the figures of old games——

Mr. WHERRY. Would it even have made any difference in the conduct of the presidential election?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, I think it might have, because the electoral votes are computed on so many for each Representative in Congress, and then two for each Senator.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The electoral votes which represent the Representatives are computed on the basis of population, and not on the basis of voters. This is a Government of the people, by the people and for the people, not a Government of the voter, by the voter and for the voter, which is sometimes lost sight of. Then, of course, two votes for each Senator are added, and they have no relation to population. Therefore, in a State in which the vote does not come out, there could very well be such a situation that the electoral vote would be different from the popular vote.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand the Senator's answer is that it would be different because if the constitutional amendment which the Senator has proposed had been in operation there might have different candidates, there might have been more work done, and all that.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. With which I agree. That might be true. But that really does not answer my question.

Mr. LODGE. Take the Tilden-Hayes election, for instance, in which the result would have been different if we assume the people had voted the same way. I think Tilden would have been elected.

Mr. WHERRY. I think the people would vote the same way. The Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. The question is not fundamentally a very intelligent one though, because it assumes a condition which would not exist. But let us assume it. I say yes, in the Hayes-Tilden election Tilden would have won under the proposed system, assuming the popular vote would have gone the same way as it did in the actual election.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I am, of course, interested in getting out all possible votes. That is my business, too.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean votes for the proposed constitutional amendment tomorrow?

Mr. WHERRY. I am referring to the votes of the people.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator with me or against me?

Mr. WHERRY. I will say that I enjoyed very much the presentation made by the Senator, and I was very much interested in the argument he made that the proposed constitutional amendment would help to get voters out, and would eliminate splinter parties. I think his argument on that point was very forceful and very ably presented.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it would eliminate them.

Mr. WHERRY. I understood the Senator to say that instead of increasing it would tend to decrease splinter parties.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would tend to decrease splinter parties.

Mr WHERRY. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator will find that I said it would eliminate splinter parties. I said if the people want to have a splinter party badly enough there is no system that can stop it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I will accept the statement the Senator now says he made. I think we understand each other, that there would be a tendency to decrease splinter parties under the so-called Lodge amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I was rather surprised earlier today when the distinguished majority leader submitted an amendment to place a floor under the electoral votes. I think his amendment is conducive to bringing about the very thing he is apprehensive of, that is splinter parties. That is number one. Number two——

Mr. LODGE. It is impossible for me to answer more than one of the Senator's questions at a time.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not asking the question now.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator making a speech?

Mr. WHERRY. No. The Senator asked me if I was interested in voting for his measure. I said I was interested in getting out all the votes of the people for President. I am interested in that. I am certainly for any plan that will translate the will of the people into the accomplishment of the purpose for which they cast their ballots. What I am called upon to do, as one who is attempting to resolve the differences of opinion, is to find whether the proposed procedure will be better than the present procedure. That is what I am trying to ascertain. In furtherance of that objective, I asked a very simple question. Based upon the actual facts and the actual votes, I ask the Senator if there would have been any difference in the election of a President if his plan had been in effect?

Mr. LODGE. I say "Yes."

Mr. WHERRY. The answer which the distinguished Senator gives me is that we cannot assume such a situation.

Mr. LODGE. But if we do assume it——

Mr. WHERRY. Before I vote on the joint resolution, for the information of the Senator, now that he has raised the question, I want to be pretty well satisfied that we are not going to lose——

Mr. LODGE. Who is not going to lose?

Mr. WHERRY. I want to be pretty well satisfied that the American people are not going to lose, and that their votes will actually count if any change is to be made. That is the point I am trying to get to.

Mr. LODGE. I will repeat my answer. If we assume that the popular vote would have been identically the same as it was—which to me is a fantastic and impossible assumption—my answer is "Yes," that the final result would have been different in a number of cases.

Mr. WHERRY. Can the Senator cite a case in which it would have been different? I have examined the record back to 1860, and I cannot find a case in which there would have been any change in the result.

Mr. LODGE. The only case I can think of is the Hayes-Tilden election, in which Tilden would have won over Hayes if the proposed system had been in effect.

The point I seem unable to convince the Senator about is that that is of no consequence. It does not make any difference.

Mr. WHERRY. Oh; yes. It would make a great deal of difference. If the Senator could say to me that we would not lose ground by this procedure——

Mr. LODGE. Who is "we," may I ask?

Mr. WHERRY. The voters. I am speaking for the voters.

Mr. LODGE. I was wondering to whom "we" referred.

Mr. WHERRY. If the distinguished Senator does not like the personal pronoun, I will strike it out and say that the junior Senator from Nebraska says he feels that the people, the voters, want to be clear on this question. I am trying to represent one of the States——

Mr. LODGE. And the Senator is doing it very well.

Mr. WHERRY. May I finish my statement? A moment ago the Senator was complaining about being interrupted before he finished. I should like very much to complete my statement.

Mr. LODGE. I am delighted to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WHERRY. I want to be sure, in translating the will of the people of Nebraska into action, that we are not going backward, but are going forward.

The only way I can resolve some of these differences is to examine history in an effort to determine what may happen in the future. I agree with the Senator that, of course, under a different procedure there might have been a difference in the result. There might have been different candidates. There might have been more effort. All those things are speculative. I must assume that the same effort would have been made and that the same vote would have been cast, in attempting to arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not there would have been a different decision in the vote under the proposed system, as compared with the present procedure. In some instances the same candidate might have been elected under the procedure which the distinguished Senator has proposed.

Mr. LODGE. Let me repeat what I said. If we assume that the popular vote would have been cast in the same manner as it was cast, and if we assume that under the proposed system it would still have been the same—which is a fantastic assumption—the final result would have been different in a number of cases.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I am through.

Mr. HOLLAND. As a preface to my question, I should like to say that I think the Senator has made a real contribution to this debate by placing in the RECORD the list of 11 States which, in the 1948 presidential election, gave their entire electoral vote to the presidential candidate of their choice, merely upon a plurality basis. That is, in none of those 11 States did the successful candidate or the successful party have a majority of all the votes cast.

I should like to comment to the Senator that in my judgment his list shows clearly how Nation-wide that situation is. For example, the Pacific Coast States of California and Oregon are in that list. Among the Southern States are the States of Florida, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Virginia. In none of them did the successful party or the successful candidate have a majority of the popular vote.

Among the border States there was the State of Maryland. Among the Midwestern States, three great States, Indiana, Michigan and Ohio, fell within that classification.

To complete the coverage of the Nation by regions, the Atlantic State of New York is in that group.

I also invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the list of States are States which went for each of the three leading candidates for President. One State went for Governor Thurmond of South Carolina. Of the other States in the list, some went for Governor Dewey of New York and some for President Truman.

So it seems to me that the list clearly shows that we need not be afraid of plurality voting, because certainly we have been practicing just that. It also shows that no one can tell in advance who will be the beneficiary and who will be injured by the adoption of a saner, safer rule. After all, the question is—and ought to be—What is a safer, saner, more democratic rule than the one which is now part of our Constitution?

The question which I wish to ask is this—and it is addressed in part to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and in part to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska—Does not the Senator believe that if the minimum figure of required plurality for election of 40 percent, as provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] and accepted, as I understand, by the Senator from Massachusetts, were made any larger, by its very size it would then contribute to the invitation to splinter parties to come into the picture? Is not the 40-percent figure about as sound a figure as could be arrived at, so as not to contribute to the invitation to splinter parties to come into the picture in any given election?

Mr. LODGE. I think that is the correct answer. I think the figure of 40 percent is about right. I suppose someone could make an argument for 41 percent; but it seems to me that, broadly speaking, 40 percent is just about the right figure.

Let me say that before the Senator from Florida asked his question he made what seemed to me to be a very able statement in his analysis of the figures and his demonstration of the fact that they were national in character and covered all parts of the country. I believe that his contribution is well worth while.

As the able Senator from Florida says, plurality voting is used in all the States of the Union. We vote by plurality for President. We vote by plurality for Senators, governors, Representatives, and all sorts of local officials. That system never gets us into any trouble. It is an extraordinary thing that in the consideration of the proposed amendment the question which has occupied most of the discussion relates to that part of the system which works best. Twelve Presidents have been elected by plurality. States cast 100 percent of their electoral votes by plurality, and yet no one ever complains about it.

I am not afraid of plurality voting. I am not bothered by the thought that Abraham Lincoln received only 39 percent of the popular vote. However, I recognize that there are Senators who are disturbed about it. I think the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is good. We did not place that provision in the joint resolution originally, first, because we thought the system was working well in that regard. We were trying to confine our amendment entirely to those parts of the Constitution which were not working well. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois places a floor under the required plurality. It would make it practically impossible for splinter parties to have a decisive influence. Moreover, I think it would tend to draw Senators to the support of the joint resolution who otherwise might not support it. I am enough of a realist, and I have been in the Senate sufficiently long to appreciate that we must defer to the views of other Senators. If there are doubts in the minds of other Senators, even though I may not share such doubts, I am going to try to do something to dispel them, even though I may not think they are justified.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an additional comment?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Speaking only for the junior Senator from Florida, I am particularly pleased with that part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] which would get away from one of the potential abuses of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, which, of course, would be repealed by the pending amendment.

That abuse was that in the event the election were thrown into the Congress, there would be provisions that the election of the President be made by the House of Representatives, whereas the election of the Vice President would be made by the Senate. There is always, of course, the chance and the opportunity that those Houses might be controlled by different parties, which would mean that in such case the twelfth amendment would not have done away at all from the very abust it was primarily intended to correct, namely, having a President and a Vice President from opposing parties and of opposing political philosophies.

Therefore, I strongly approve the amendment which, in the event the election came to Congress, would throw the election of the President and the Vice President into the hands and upon the consciences of the same group, namely, the combined Houses of Congress, the House of Representatives and the Senate. I think that is an additional means of getting away from some of the confusion, which has always been present since the twelfth amendment has been added to the Constitution.

Mr. LODGE. I am glad the Senator thinks that is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I inquire who has the floor?

Mr. LODGE. I have the floor, but I have finished.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLAND. Yes; with the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator consider that this proposed amendment to the Constitution would have a tendency to permit the Federal Government to invade the control of the States over election laws? Under the proposal a candidate would be given credit for all popular votes recorded for him. Does it not follow he could demand that his name be put on the ballot in any State? The States say they have control over whose name goes on the ballot. But if the Constitution guarantees him the end credit for all votes cast in his favor, would not the courts say the Federal Government should also assure him the means, which is to say placing his name on the ballot?

Mr. HOLLAND. I think the Senator is basing his question on a false premise. I have never heard anyone contend that the States have full power over the election of President, Vice President, and other Federal officials. The debates have customarily been based upon section 2 of article I of the Constitution, which has to do solely with the qualifications of electors.

But I call the attention of the distinguished Senator—and equally call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, because this provision of the Constitution seems to have been overlooked by both of them in their able arguments—to the fact that section 4 of article I of the Constitution has always, since the foundation of the Nation, provided that—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

So there has never been any contention upon this floor, so far as I have heard, that the Federal Government does not already have authority under the Constitution in any matter that vitally affects it and its welfare and which falls within the provision I have just quoted; and I think both Senators have overlooked that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, then I should like to have the Senator reply to this question: Has not it been contended that the poll tax could not be removed by the Congress of the United States because it is purely a matter for local elections?

Mr. HOLLAND. Exactly, and that is where the Senator has fallen into error. He is confusing the poll-tax situation with the more general provisions of section 4, article I. The poll-tax situation has always been based upon section 2, of article I, which contains, among other things, a provision with respect to Members of the House of Representatives, and then the following language:

> And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

That provision has no relation to anything else except the qualification of electors, and that provision is repeated in the seventeenth amendment, in those identical words.

If I may call the matter to the attention of the two Senators—I am sure it is already known to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—the same provision is contained, in identical words, in the proposed constitutional amendment which now is before us and is being debated. It is already the only provision that is twice, in identical words, contained in the Constitution of the United States; and if the Congress in its wisdom sees fit to submit this proposed amendment, and if it be adopted by the required number of States, then for the third time will the Constitution, by provisions written into it—one at the beginning of our Government, one in 1913, and one at whatever time in the future this amendment be adopted—contain that provision, which certainly means that the qualification of electors, and that only, is completely left to the laws of the States.

But the Senator is assuming what I think is unsound, namely, that that provision goes further than the matter of the qualification of electors.

If the Senator will but read section 4 of the same article I of the Constitution, he will see, I think, what is very manifest, namely, that the founding fathers in their wisdom retained in the Congress the power to change matters affecting the times, places, and manner—which I think means the method—of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, in the event it is necessary to protect those vital Federal matters.

I may say in closing that if the Senators will examine the case books, they will find that cases have been up, under this section—section 4—as distinguished from section 2, and have been subjected to scrutiny and analysis by the Supreme Court of the United States, which has in several cases specifically upheld the power of Congress to act under section 4. But section 4 and section 2 are entirely different, and do not relate to the same subject matter.

It was that which I called to the attention of the two distinguished Senators, because it seems to me they may have overlooked it in the debate.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAIN in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. However, as I understand, the Congress has not exercised its power to regulate the method of holding elections, as a general proposition. The Senator from Florida and other Senators from the South certainly have objected to having the Congress do so.

My suggestion is that if this amendment is adopted, there will be a much greater incentive to do so. That necessarily must be so.

Not only that, but it seems to me we must then act under the provision of the Constitution in section 2 of the fourteenth amendment, namely—

> But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President—> is denied any of the male inhabitants of such State, being 21 years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, * * * the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

And so forth—

Certainly, from all the evidence, the voting in the South is away below the representation. The evidence in the Bilbo case showed clearly that the deterrent to the voting of Negroes in Mississippi was such that practically none of them voted or dared to vote.

It seems to me that if we become interested—as we must, if this amendment is adopted—in every single vote cast, then inevitably the Congress will enact national legislation to regulate the voting, doing so in such a manner that every person of voting age in every State in the southern part of the country will have an absolute, clear, and free right to vote in the way he or she wishes to vote. It appears to me that will be the inevitable result of the adoption of the amendment. I do not say it would not be a good result, but I merely want to suggest to the Senator that I think it would be the inevitable result, if the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I do not feel that that is the inevitable result, at all. I think the Senator, again, is forgetting that he is dealing with a subject matter which has nothing in the world to do with section 2 of article I of the Constitution, which relates solely to the qualifications of electors.

On the matter of the general exercise by Congress of its rights and prerogatives under section 4 of article I in case of elections, I think the Senator, upon examining the statutes, will find he is mistaken in his statement that the Congress has not exercised jurisdiction in that field, because, to the contrary, in the matter of providing for the distribution and membership of the House of Representatives, and in the matter of providing what shall be done in the event a State does not itself redistrict when it gets more or has fewer Representatives, and in many other matters affecting the election of Federal officers, the distinguished Senator will find, as I recall, that the Congress has acted under section 4 of article I of the Constitution. It would not be anything new for the Congress to have to act under that section, if it felt there was a need to do so. I think the Senator has confused the present issue with section 2 of article I of the Constitution.

In his last remarks, I fear that he confuses the present issue with that arising under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. While that is a very interesting subject to discuss, and one which I shall be glad to discuss at any appropriate time. I think it has no relation at all to the pending matter. I think if the Senator reexamines it he will find it provides an entirely different sort of remedy from the one which he had in mind.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator feel that section 2, the fourteenth amendment, distinctly modifies the general provision that the States shall prescribe the qualifications of electors?

Mr. HOLLAND. I do not. I think it has to do solely with the permitting of all the male inhabitants of the State to vote upon equal terms, without discrimination. And I specially call the Senator's attention to the fact that the seventeenth amendment, adopted in 1913, reaffirms in the same original words the principle that the States control the qualification of electors.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the distinguished Senators from Massachusetts and Tennessee, and other Senators, have already covered the substance of the proposed amendment very thoroughly. I do not propose to go over the substantive material. There are one or two points I hope to make. I merely want to say in beginning that, I favor the resolution, for many of the reasons which have already been given by other speakers. Of course it is not my business to advise nor even be concerned with how the minority party might win elections, but it seems to me rather difficult to understand the reluctance of certain members of the minority party to accept changes in our electoral system, when I think back over the experience they have had in the last 20 years.

Mr. WHERRY. Eighteen years.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Eighteen years. On principle, it would seem to me that some change could not make the system any worse, and possibly might make it a little better.

The reasons for adoption of the present system of permitting electors to select a President no longer exist. It is well known that the system has not worked in the way that it was intended since the earliest days of the Constitution. The fact that the people needed no supermen to register their votes has been apparent for a long time, and, indeed, until very recently it was rarely doubted that an elector was obliged merely to act as a dummy in registering the wishes of a majority of his State.

It is apparent that the present system is outmoded; but if this is not reason enough for a change, it should also be noted that it is unfair and inaccurate. It nullifies the votes cast for a candidate in each State where that candidate loses. It can and has resulted in the defeat of a candidate against the will of a plurality of the voters; and although this may still be possible, theoretically, under Senate Joint Resolution 2, the dangers of its occurring are very substantially lessened.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Why does the Senator think the danger would be lessened? We have in the hearings the example of the 1900 McKinley-Bryan election. In spite of McKinley's getting 52.8 percent of the total vote and a majority of 850,000, which was a large majority at that time, equivalent to about 3,000,000 today, Bryan would have won under this system, although he had a minority of the popular vote. How can the Senator say it in any way eliminates the possibility of electing a President contrary to the popular vote?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I say it is possible theoretically, but I think when it is applied——

Mr. TAFT. It is not theoretical. It actually happened, or would have happened, in 1900. It is not merely theoretical. There it is, on the books.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I said that under this system it is still possible theoretically to have it happen, but it is less likely to happen, I think. I believe the examples set forth in the hearings would indicate it is less likely to happen than under the existing system. Of course, the reason for its being still possible is due to the retention of the significance of Senators; that is, the representation by two Senators from each State, no matter how small the State. It is true that in a State like Nevada, taking the extreme case, and in similar States, it is weighted in favor of those States. As a practical matter, I think the Senator will admit if that element in the electoral college were eliminated, there would be not one chance in a thousand that any such amendment would be adopted.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I do not admit it for a moment. That is not the thing that makes it possible to elect a man contrary to the popular vote. But this proposed new system would give a tremendous advantage to the one-party State as opposed to the larger States.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not understand that, that the amendment would give a tremendous advantage to a one-party State over what it has now. How is that so?

Mr. TAFT. It would have an advantage over the larger States.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No, the Senator said a one-party State.

Mr. TAFT. Take for example the McKinley-Bryan election. In that election, McKinley, who came from Ohio, carried Ohio by a substantial majority. Under Senate Joint Resolution 2, he would get 12 electoral votes in Ohio; Bryan would get 10.4. In other words, the State of Ohio would weigh in the general national election 1.6 electoral votes in favor of McKinley. On the other hand, the State of South Carolina, a much smaller State, with only 9 electoral votes, would have given McKinley .6, and would have given Bryan 8.4, thereby giving a majority to Bryan of 7.8 electoral votes from the State of South Carolina, because it was a one-party State and cast a very small vote, as compared to 1.6 electoral votes for the entire State of Ohio. And today, in Ohio, I should think 125,000 would be a substantial majority, if we carried the State by that much. Mr. Dewey as a matter of fact carried it by 12,000 in 1944. He lost it by 7,000 in 1948. Very well. Supposing we carry it by 125,000. We get 1 electoral vote net—13 for us, 12 for the Democratic candidates.

On the other hand, take the State of Georgia, where the vote is about 3 to 1. They have less than half the population of Ohio. They have 12 electoral votes instead of 25, and they vote them 9 to 3, so they get 6 net votes for the Democratic candidate. A one-party State has an influence on the election out of all proportion to its population or to the vote which it casts. That is why they can entirely upset the popular majority, and why they would have upset the McKinley-Bryan election in 1900, and have elected Bryan instead of McKinley.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is saying "a one-party State." Under a system which is proposed by the amendment I do not think we would continue to have one-party States.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In a moment. The Senator from Ohio, and other Senators, who have been critical, not only in this instance, but every time there has been a discussion about conditions in the South, have always looked at the vote in the general election, which is not an accurate criterion by which to judge the voting strength of the South. It is quite true that while they are not one party, one party is predominant; it has been for quite a number of years; and the people do not vote in the general elections simply because there is no particular point in their doing so. But I think the record in my State will show, for example, that if there were a point in voting in the general election, even now, without any further development, approximately a third of the votes would immediately go to the minority party. At the present time there is no point in their voting either for State officers or for local officers.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But the primary vote in July is extremely hotly contested, and the number of votes relative to the number of qualified electors is very favorable, compared with any other State. Yet those figures are always ignored when Senators come to assess the situation in the Southern States.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Of course, McKinley received more than a third of the votes in Arkansas in 1900. But the question I am raising is as to the tremendous weight given to a one-party State as against a larger State in which the votes in the past 20 years have, in general, been very close. It would apply just as much to the State of Vermont. I do not believe the Senator from Arkansas could convince me that if this amendment is agreed to, the Democrats will receive any more votes in Vermont than they receive at this time. I do not think we can change the situation simply because we have a different system of elections. A one-party State simply grows up that way. Nearly everyone in the State joins a particular party, and once it has reached that point, it is very difficult to change the situation. Yet such a one-party State has a weight in determining an election far out of proportion to its size or importance. For instance, the State of Georgia, with a population of less than half that of Ohio, would have an infinitely greater influence in the election of a President than would some two-party State. I can see why the Southern States should be in favor of the amendment, if they do not object to the Federal Government's running their elections, because, unquestionably, it will give them a greater choice in the Democratic Party. It will be more valuable to the Democratic Party. I should think this system would be so exceedingly important to the Democratic Party that there would no longer be any danger of divisions among the Democrats of the South.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator from Ohio wishes to discuss the subject on that basis, let me say, as I said in the beginning, in view of the experience of the past 18 years, it seems to me the Senator would be willing to take a chance in the hope that some change might be made in the existing situation. I am not particularly advocating it in order to enable the Republicans to have at least an outside chance to win an election. I agree that because small States have two Senators, with no relation to the population, to that extent the proposal is weighted in favor of the small States——

Mr. TAFT. But that is not different from the present situation. I do not criticize that provision at all. But it gives tremendous weight to a small one-party State as against a large State in which the parties are approximately equally divided.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is assuming that the pattern of voting in a State will not change. Take, for instance, my own State, or the State of the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]. I am informed that the population of Florida has increased nearly 30 percent in 10 years and that a large part of that increase is due to the fact that northern Republicans have moved to that State for various purposes—because they are able to, because taxes are lower, or for other reasons. In all likelihood, they are not going to take an active part in politics, because it would be fairly hopeless. They may become Democrats if they are inclined to take part in politics. I know of many persons who have come to my State and have said, "There is no use being a Republican. The Republican Party does not even have candidates." Therefore, they have become Democrats.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator has made reference to the State of Florida, which I represent, but he was not on the floor when, a few minutes ago, the Senator from Massachusetts introduced a list of States which gave their electoral votes in the 1948 election for President—by a plurality vote rather than by a majority vote. There were 11 such States, and the State of Florida was one of them. The Democratic Party did not cast the majority of all votes cast in the 1948 election in Florida, but, notwithstanding that fact we received the entire electoral vote of Florida. It seems to the junior Senator from Florida that it is not unfair or undemocratic for many thousands of Florida citizens, who may belong to parties other than the party to which he belongs, to have some opportunity to register, in a practical way, in an election of President and Vice President, their choice for those offices. It seems to me that the hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of Democrats in the great State of Ohio may be safely allowed an opportunity to have their votes counted in the final tabulation in an election of a President and Vice President. It seems to me a more democratic pattern is set up under the proposed amendment to register the real choice of the people.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Florida for his contribution.

I desire to make one further observation. It has been said that the amendment would give an undue advantage to a State which is predominantly of one party. I would say that the present system permits of an undue influence. Take New York as an example. The entire 47 electoral votes go one way, which may represent a difference of only two or three hundred thousand popular votes.

I do not think there is anything fair about that as being representative of the will of the people.

The idea has been created that no one can aspire to the Presidency if he does not come from New York, or Ohio, or Virginia, or——

Mr. TAFT. Will the Senator include Missouri in the list?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not recall any candidate from Missouri having been originally nominated. One of the reasons for that is the situation which I have just been discussing. The Senator from Ohio well knows that the present President of the United States first became President through the death of a President. Could anyone imagine that a person from New Mexico could be nominated? Yet a good man from New Mexico should be available presidential material. This amendment would certainly make it possible for such a man to be considered. Today we have to look only to a few States, as a practical matter, for presidential material.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I am very much inclined to go along with the Senator's position on this amendment, except that it seems to me that, lurking somewhere in the field of possibilities, is the danger that by taking this action we might contribute to the growth of splinter parties all over the country, resulting in the destruction of our two-party system, even in those areas of the Nation in which there is now a strong two-party system. Having in mind that perhaps the authors of the resolution might accept an amendment which would eliminate the danger on that point, I am offering an amendment to page 3 which would limit the counting of the electoral votes in Washington to the two candidates in each State who receive the largest percentage of votes in their respective States.

If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I should like to send my amendment to the desk.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. All I can say is that I have not heretofore seen the Senator's amendment. I firmly oppose more than two parties. I have thought about how the problem could be met, and the Senator may have the answer. The only thing that troubled me was the question of the transition. The junior Senator from Ohio said it might come about under the present circumstances. Some very thoughtful persons have suggested that there may be a new party to take the place of the Republican Party. That might not be a bad thing.

Mr. MUNDT. I believe the Senator from Ohio referred to a new party to take the place of the Republican Party, with the so-called Dixiecrats of the South, merging them into some so-called phalanx for freedom.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. A little over 100 years ago the Republican Party was formed out of the remains of the Whigs, and I think the "Know Nothings" or "Free Traders," and several other parties, so that in the new party there was a multiplicity of others. It lasted 4 or 5 years, then there were two parties. The only thing that bothers me is that we do not want a restriction so that there can be no change, because the change when the Republican Party was formed was healthy. I think it was a good thing that the Republican Party grew out of that situation. That is the only observation I desire to make on that point.

Mr. MUNDT. I share the Senator's concern that we leave the door open for new parties to try out their wings, and for that purpose to merge or change. Their planks can grow into a third party which will eventually eliminate one of the other parties. It was for that reason that I sought to insert this amendment at the point where the votes are to be counted, in what was formerly the electoral college, which will now be in the Congress of the United States.

It would leave full opportunity in the various States for a multiplicity of parties, but permit only the two which obtain the greatest percentage of votes to be registered in the final count in Washington for the selection of a President.

I think we should have some safeguard. I can think of nothing more calamitous that could occur than to have a splinter party framework develop in this country. I am sure the Senator agrees with that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not think multiple parties work well at all. As I see it, the two-party system is much the best for the country. I would see no objection to the amendment, but some of those who have given much greater thought to this subject than I have should consider it. However, if it would achieve the purpose aimed at, it is a very worth-while amendment.

Mr. President, the present system can and does result in exaggerating the importance of minority pressure groups, who, because of strict discipline or fanatical interest in a particular issue, may hold a balance of power all out of proportion to their numbers, or to the justice of their cause.

In case it is not enough that the system is outmoded, unfair, and inaccurate, it should also be noted that it is, in these times, potentially dangerous. Any political campaign for the presidency during periods of international tension has certain hazards in matters of foreign policy and national defense. This fact was recognized during the last campaign, as both candidates found it necessary to reassure our friends and our enemies that our policy in these matters generally would be continuous. Yet there was the ever-present danger that the normal uncertainties would be increased by the possibility that the election would be indecisive—that some several months later the issue would be decided in the House of Representatives. There was the additional danger, even though the election was decisive one way in form, that, in fact, the will of a plurality would have been thwarted—that we would have an Executive exercising tremendous powers without the concurrence of a plurality of his people.

In these days it is necessary that our Government have the power and ability to act immediately in an emergency. This is not merely a matter of form, nor of compliance with the required constitutional and statutory devices. It is that, and the knowledge that a President represents the will, and has the backing, of the people of his country, as expressed by a decisive election. Without an effective expression of the people's will, as is possible under the present system, it is not at all difficult to imagine a President too reluctant to act in times of crises, or, if he does act, a people unwilling to support him.

Of course, we cannot remove all the dangers of elections at crucial periods—there are always uncertainties as to what a change may mean. We prefer these dangers, as necessary elements of our system of government, which, we believe, ultimately strengthen us. However, we can remove uncertainties which are not essential to democratic processes, and we can strengthen those processes to make certain our decisions.

The system proposed by Senate Joint Resolution 2 has been compared with proportional representation, as practiced in France, and which has so weakened the French Government. The systems are similar, of course, in that the votes cast for a candidate who loses in a particular State are nevertheless counted for him in determining the over-all result of the election. The conclusion has been drawn, because of this similarity, that we shall encourage the formation of a multitude of parties, as has been brought about in France.

Proportional representation, when applied to the election of a legislature may lead to such a result. In periods of great controversy, where there are widely divergent views on national policy, by giving representation to all possible views, there results a legislature which is so perfectly representative of each divergent view that it is most difficult to find a common meeting ground on any course of action. There is such a multiplicity of represented opinion that there is one opinion which can be made effective.

The reason why proportional representation results in multiple parties is that those parties are founded in the certain knowledge that almost any policy which has appeal for any appreciable number of people will get them some representation, some voice in the government, and therefore some power in it.

If we apply this reasoning to the election of a single officeholder, we can easily see that it is not applicable. A candidate for that office must still get a plurality of all the votes cast; the votes which he receives as losing candidate within a State get him no power unless he obtains a plurality of all the votes. The acquisition of power in government is in no way affected by assuring a candidate that the votes cast for him will be counted for him.

Therefore, if Senate Joint Resolution 2 will lead to the formation of multiple parties, it will not be because of any similarities to proportional representation.

I doubt that the change in itself will result in the immediate building of a two-party system in each State. Much of this depends upon local, county and State organizations, contesting for local, county and State offices. The system would not materially affect this dependency, and by the same reasoning the creation of third parties would not be aided in this respect. But the system will be a step strengthening two-party government, as it will extend presidential campaigns to all States. Eventually, presidential campaigns in each State may result in effective local organization in all States.

Our two parties, generally, have been so alined as to prevent violent swings of the pendulum of government from blind reaction to extreme radicalism. We have thereby followed a generally moderate, but progressive course through the years. Lately, however, the pressure of minority groups has tended to minimize this effect, until we have been threatened, or at least greatly influenced, by minority groups. These groups, when they operate within the two-party system, as well as when they operate as third parties, derive their power, not from their strength in numbers, or from the general appeal of their cause, but from those peculiarities of the present system which enable them to swing a far greater number of votes than they may have.

The argument has been made by the opponents of this resolution that the splinter parties—such as Henry Wallace's in the last election—will be encouraged by reason of the fact that they will gain electoral votes, in addition to the popular votes they now receive. I cannot see that it is any encouragement to receive only an electoral reflection of the actual popular vote. Furthermore, this argument ignores the only reason for the present existence and power of splinter parties—that they are now, under the present system, able to exert an undue influence by reason of their ability to swing the entire electoral vote of a State away from one candidate. Or that they may be able, under the present system, to throw the election into the House of Representatives. It is this power, which they now may have, under favorable circumstances, that endangers the present system. Senate Joint Resolution 2 takes away this power, and thereby discourages splinter groups.

It has been our experience that third parties generally do not seek to stand on their own feet, seeking power through their own merits. Rather they attempt to negate the wishes of a majority, by the exercise of a veto power. The adoption of this proposal, while it will not destroy third parties—it will require them to come out in the open, and to seek power upon the basis of their true appeal. They would obtain no more, and no less than they are entitled to.

The question arises, of course, if our present system is defective why not abolish the electoral vote entirely and elect our President by a direct popular vote? I think the system proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 2 is not only more likely to be adopted but that it is better.

Senate Joint Resolution 2 extends and perfects our present system, making it workable, accurate, and democratic, in accordance with the basic compromise which resulted in the Union. Direct popular election would break down one of the intricate facets of this compromise. As the Brookings Institute has observed, Senate Joint Resolution 2 "preserves the compromise between the large and small States that permitted the adoption of the Constitution and the formation of a more perfect Union and leaves the States free to determine the qualifications requisite for voters." On the other hand, direct popular election is entirely inconsistent with this theory. I believe this to be so, because I cannot conceive of the States being permitted to qualify whomever they please, regardless of age or literacy or any other proper qualification, in order to throw undue weight to its voting population in a contest with other States. The promotion of sectional rivalries under such a system is obvious.

We have a conflict of theories in our entire system of government. On the one hand we theorize that the source of power derives from the people, that the people, in the exercise of their rights in government, should be accorded equal voice. This is the principle of pure majority rule, and to achieve perfection in its operation it would require, not only actual equality, but uniformity of interest. In recognition of the imperfections man, and to protect that other source of power, the States, the Constitution effected a series of compromises between the theories of States' rights and pure majority rule. A system of checks and balances was built up, not only in restraint of powers to be exercised by the Federal Government, but as to who would exercise those powers. Thus we have a House of Representatives, determined upon the basis of population; and we have a Senate, as a balance to that popular representation. This same fundamental compromise is the basis for the provision of electoral votes in the same numbers as there are representatives and Senators.

The greatest danger to our institutions today lies in the concentration of power, totalitarianism—the very evil which our system of checks and balances, of which the electoral vote is a part, is designed to check. There is a corresponding danger in the abuse, by a minority, of those rights designed to protect it. The classic example, of course, is the tactics of communism. When in power, the Communists ruthlessly suppress minority rights. When not in power they, perhaps just as ruthlessly, adopt every possible disruptive tactic.

Under Senate Joint Resolution 2 we effect a compromise between these two extremes, we lessen the disruptive ability of minorities, yet we protect them from the absolute power of the majority by retaining the electoral vote.

There are still great variations in the economic, educational, and cultural patterns of this country, from State to State, and region to region, which still need the protection which our system of checks and balances gives. There is danger of geographical concentration of power, following lines of population, just as there are dangers in any other form of concentration of power. These are geographical—State and regional—considerations, having little or no relation to the population of those geographical divisions, which are desirable of representation, not only in the Congress, but in the system of electing a President.

We protect this diversity of interests, by our constitutional system and by our two-party government, in such a manner that our Government is rarely perfectly representative of any of its people, in all its programs, but is generally the common meeting ground of a great number of its people. This system of checks and balances, of which the electoral vote is a part, is the result of basic compromise, and is, itself, properly to be used as a lever of compromise, avoiding extremes, and requiring our people and our Government to pursue a course that is fair to the country as a whole. We are not changing this system by Senate Joint Resolution 2, but rather we are attempting to make it work better, to be more expressive of its underlying concept. We are attempting to perfect a part of the great compromise which made our federation successful.

Mr. President, it has been mentioned on the floor of the Senate that because we adopted a resolution last year which called for the appointment of a committee to study the over-all problem perhaps we should delay action on the joint resolution. I do not subscribe to that idea at all. I think this particular joint resolution has already received long consideration, both in the House and in the Senate, and I hope the Senate will proceed to pass the joint resolution now so that it can be sent to the House and receive early action in that body.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if no other Senator wishes to speak at this time, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

George V. Allen, of North Carolina, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Yugoslavia, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

John M. Cabot, of Massachusetts, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Finland;

Gerald A. Drew, of California, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, now United States representative on the United Nations Special Balkan Committee, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Hashemite Kingdom of the Jordan;

H. Merle Cochran, of Arizona, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Republic of the United States of Indonesia, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Avra M. Warren, of Maryland, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Pakistan, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Ely E. Palmer, of Rhode Island, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be the representative of the United States of America on the Conciliation Commission for Palestine which was established by resolution of the General Assembly of the United Nations December 11, 1948, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate;

Jefferson Patterson, of Ohio, a Foreign Service officer of class 1, to be the representative of the United States of America on the Special Balkan Committee established by the General Assembly of the United Nations October 21, 1947, vice Gerald A. Drew;

Mrs. Olive Remington Goldman, of Illinois, to be the representative of the United States of America on the Commission on the Status of Women of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations for a term of 3 years;

Mark A. May, of Connecticut, to be a member of the United States Advisory Commission on Information for a term of 3 years expiring January 27, 1953, and until his successor has been appointed and qualified (reappointment);

Justin Miller, of California, to be a member of the United States Advisory Commission on Information for a term of 3 years expiring January 27, 1953, and until his successor has been appointed and qualified (reappointment);

Lewis Clark, of Alabama, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be the representative of the United States of America on the United Nations Advisory Council for Libya;

Charles S. Reed 2d, of Ohio, and sundry other officers and persons for promotion and appointment in the diplomatic service; and Glen A. Abbey, of Wisconsin, and sundry other Foreign Service officers for promotion in the diplomatic service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the nominations on the calendar will be stated.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edward W. Barrett, of Connecticut, to be an Assistant Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION FOR THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE FOUNDING OF PORT-AU-PRINCE, REPUBLIC OF HAITI

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Shaw Young, of New York, to be United States Commissioner to the International Exposition for the Bicentennial of the founding of Port-au-Prince, Republic of Haiti.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of United States attorneys.

Mr. HOLLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of United States attorneys may be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of United States marshals.

Mr. HOLLAND. I make the same unanimous-consent request with respect to the confirmation of the nominations of United States marshals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of United States marshals are confirmed en bloc.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. HOLLAND. I make the same unanimous-consent request with respect to the confirmation of the postmaster nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc; and, without objection, the President will be notified of all nominations this day confirmed.

RECESS

Mr. HOLLAND. If there be no further business to be transacted at this time, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 1, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, at this noonday moment we look backward in gratitude and forward in confidence, for we know that Thou art the same today as Thou wert yesterday.

As we onward walk the paths of duty, do Thou endow us with stout hearts and open minds. Stimulate us with that faith that greets the dawn rather than the setting sun; faith in Thee, in our fellow men, and in the ultimate triumph of all things right. Dismissing past regrets and future fears, send us forth on errands of mercy and good will; then we shall have the restful satisfaction that comes to those who have borne wisely and well their part. Fill us with large sympathies for others, and bless us with complete trust in Thy goodness, and Thine shall be the glory forever. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNITED STATES COAST GUARD ACADEMY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 25, 1950.

The SPEAKER,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to section 194 of title 14 of the United States Code, I have appointed the following members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to serve as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Coast Guard Academy for the year 1950: Hon. HERBERT C. BONNER, Hon. JAMES B. HARE, Hon. T. MILLET HAND.

As chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I am authorized to serve as an ex officio member of the Board.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

S. O. BLAND, Chairman.

UNITED STATES MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 30, 1950.

The SPEAKER,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to Public Law 301 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, I have appointed the following members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to serve as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Merchant Marine Academy for the year 1950: Hon. HERBERT C. BONNER, Hon. DONALD L. O'TOOLE, Hon. ALVIN F. WEICHEL.

As chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I am authorized to serve as an ex officio member of the Board.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

S. O. BLAND, Chairman.

COTTON AND PEANUT ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS AND MARKETING QUOTAS

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 398, relating to cotton and peanut acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 398, with Mr. SMITH of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on yesterday the Clerk had read through section 1 of the bill. Are there further amendments to section 1?

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of California: On page 2, line 10, strike out the figure "40" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "50."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes, 5 minutes for the proponent and 5 minutes for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I will make my remarks very brief, inasmuch as we debated this matter yesterday quite thoroughly. This amendment is one which would certainly not require very much of an expenditure in addition to the estimate which has been provided by the Department of Agriculture covering the cost of this resolution. It is a very small matter insofar as funds are concerned. This 40-percent restriction which is now in the resolution attempts to tell the farmer that he shall not plant cotton but once in 3 years on his total land. I think that is wrong. I think it is perfectly good husbandry to plant cotton every other year. That is just what this 50-percent amendment would allow. On that basis, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the membership to understand the meaning of the amendment. For 10 years or more the cotton-quota law has contained a provision that no allotment to a farm should exceed, under the old law, 40 percent of the cotton planted and the cotton diverted in 1937. That was found wise. After giving each State, including the State of Georgia and the State of California and other States, all of the cotton that they are rightfully entitled to as their fair portion of the national quota and after the counties have received their full share we are coming now, due to some inequities which have arisen, and adding to them, giving every grower up to 70 percent of his 3-year average or 50 percent of his highest planting in either 1946, 1947, or 1948.

In its wisdom, the committee limited that by saying we will build you up to 70 percent, but not beyond 40 percent of your entire cultivated acreage on your farm.

The gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE] now proposes to strike that 40 percent and say that we can give him up to half of his entire cultivated land on his farm.

It was estimated by the committee that the 40-percent limitation would cut off of the 1,400,000-acre estimate otherwise added between one hundred and two hundred thousand acres. There has been no estimate made as to what the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California would be, but certainly it would add additional acreage over and above what the 40 percent would do.

We think the bill now provides rather liberal contributions, due to the inequities. Therefore, I am quite sure it is the view of a majority of the committee that this amendment should not be approved.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. The gentleman stated that the 1938 law provided for 40 percent of the 1937 planting. Does he not mean 50 percent?

Mr. PACE. No, sir. The old law was that no county would be given less than 60 percent of the 1937 planted and diverted and no farm would be given less than 50 percent of the 1937 planted and diverted, but that this amendment should not increase the allotment to the farm greater than 40 percent of the cultivated land.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is correct.

Mr. PACE. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, he says that in this instance it shall not be less than 50 percent of the cultivated land. I think the resolution as submitted is well balanced, and respectfully ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Certainly I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am in accord with the gentleman's views that this amendment should be defeated. But will the gentleman explain to the House about the minimum acreage that a cotton farmer can get. Is that 5 acres that he is allowed? There is some misunderstanding about it.

Mr. PACE. The new law is exactly the same as the old law since 1938, namely, that any farmer who has been growing 5 acres or less of cotton will suffer no cut whatever. He will be given an allotment for the full amount that he has been growing, up to 5 acres. Then the law further provides that for those who have 5 acres up to 15 acres they shall get an additional, special allotment to build them up toward 15 acres; the idea being that it will take something in that range, between 5 and 15 acres, to give a man acreage comparable with his needs. I hope that covers the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has already been fixed. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

All time on the amendment having expired, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARE: On page 2, line 8, after the colon and before the word "Provided" insert the following: "Provided, That the allotment to each farm shall be determined by the county committee, subject to review in accordance with section 3 of this resolution, on the basis of satisfactory evidence submitted by the producers."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be reserved for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, this amendment is what may be considered as a clarifying amendment. It is recognized that the State of Texas has been subjected to what is commonly known as the California clause. It is further recognized that the acreage allotted to the State of Texas was subjected to the clause because the phrase "actually planted" was used in the original law. It is further recognized that the Bureau of Agricultural Economics statistics are inaccurate. It is further recognized that the reason we are here now is because of maladministration of the law; that is, not in accordance with the intent of this Congress.

The purpose of this amendment is to place the responsibility where it lies, particularly to permit the county committees to allocate acreage to each individual farmer in accordance with the legal evidence which he can submit to such committee with regard to the acreage he actually planted in cotton during the basic years. There is nothing hard to understand about the amendment; in fact, it is easy to understand; it just places the responsibility with the county committee, deprives the Department of Agriculture of the responsibility of saying "You planted so much," and saying to the county committee instead: "You determine how much the farmer planted."

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. The gentleman's purpose by this amendment is to try to simplify the business of making appeals.

Mr. HARE. That is absolutely true; that is, to place the responsibility on the county committee which can determine the case of each individual farmer.

Mr. FISHER. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, and I am sorry I did not hear it read, it has reference to what he hopes will prove to be a more accurate way of arriving at the actual acreage rather than depending on the BAE statistics.

Mr. HARE. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. FISHER. I recall that in the debate 2 or 3 days ago it was stated that the present method was based upon estimate and speculation.

Mr. HARE. That is true.

Mr. FISHER. It is true because the BAE does not have the record of the actual plantings. Is that correct?

Mr. HARE. That is true.

Mr. FISHER. Therefore, inevitably, under such a program there would be some injustice produced because of the fact that the BAE does not and cannot have the statistics in the small localities of each State.

Mr. HARE. That is true.

Mr. FISHER. And the gentleman's amendment proposes to correct that by giving the county committees some control or jurisdiction over determining the amount of acreage the individual farmer is entitled to.

Mr. HARE. That is true. I think it is recognized that the Department of Agriculture cannot effectively and accurately determine what the farmer has actually planted, and I propose to give that responsibility to people who do know.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARE. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. FISHER. I wish to point out for the record that in the area from which I come there are probably half a dozen counties in which very careful surveys have been made mostly by the county committees with respect to the accuracy of the BAE figures; and in a number of them it has turned out to be a matter of pure speculation when compared with the actual known facts. The BAE figures are from 25 to 35 percent under the actual plantings. That is not a matter of speculation, but a matter of known fact.

Mr. HARE. I can cite the gentleman a specific instance, the instance of a man in a neighboring county to mine. When he received his particular acreage allotment he went to the county committee, showed them his crop-insurance receipts where he had planted 75 or 80 acres of cotton and paid insurance on it, but the BAE adjusted figures indicated he did not do that. They indicated he planted only 35 or 40.

If we do not specifically state the procedure to be followed and definitely define the responsibility of each administrator, then we can only expect some bureaucrat in the Department of Agriculture to foul up the program in order that the socialistic Brannan plan will have a greater appeal because the farmers will be disgusted with the present program.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina undoubtedly has mentioned an important problem and equally undoubtedly the committee has dealt with it. If the Members will turn to page 1129 of yesterday's RECORD, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] inserted there a letter from the Deputy Administrator of the Production and Marketing Administration in which he sets out in detail exactly how this problem is going to be handled.

There is some complaint about the BAE figures in some counties. It is set out there that under this resolution when a cotton farmer's allotment is fixed he will be mailed a notice. The notice states:

> If you are not satisfied with this allotment, either from the base acreage or from the percentage standpoint, you can enter an appeal.

Then a public notice will be given every other farmer in the county who does not get an increase in acreage that he might file an appeal.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be unkind to the committees in my State or in South Carolina or anywhere else, but here is the story. You can take it as you like. The Department of Agriculture and this committee have some concern about letting any county committees control this situation. Why? We are now saying to X county that we are going to give the farmers of that county an additional acreage to build them up to 70 percent of their past history. We are going to add that to what they now have. What is going to be the inclination of some county committeemen? If you will study what has been done in the last 90 days you know what can happen.

The county committee men will say: "Well, here, we are going to get something extra. We will revise these bases and these other figures and instead of bringing 5,000 more acres into this county we will bring 25,000 more in. It does not take anything from anybody. We are going to reach out and get it and add that much more."

The system here is that if your BAE figures are not right we are not going to let that county committee decide it, but we are going to let a review committee composed of members of committee members from the surrounding counties settle it. We are going to let the whole group of that area determine whether or not the BAE estimates are correct. If the farmer goes before the review committee, and, as the gentleman from South Carolina says, has proof to show that the BAE estimates on the base acreage are incorrect, they will be corrected and additional acreage will be added. But I appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina, I appeal to the Members of the House, in the name of orderly administration do not put this temptation into the hands of your respective county committees where they will without cost to anybody just reach up and get more 70's, more 70's, and still more 70's until the additional acreage under this resolution will not be 1,400,000 but will likely be three or four million acres added on.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. I think the gentleman may be taking a little counsel of his fears because I think he recognizes as I stated before that we are here because of maladministration in the Department of Agriculture. The only thing I am intending to do or trying to do is to spell out in the law just what the Department of Agriculture in its procedure will do.

Mr. PACE. I may say to the distinguished gentleman that the Department itself has spelled it out in the form of a letter to the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, which he put in the RECORD, and he says in detail exactly how they are going to correct these BAE estimates, and I hope it suits the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; it does suit the gentleman from Arkansas. And is it not a fact that the difference in the proposal of the gentleman from South Carolina and the method of administration by the Department is the fact that a committee outside of the county will determine it, and under his amendment the local county committee will determine it.

Mr. PACE. The statement of the gentleman from Arkansas should be significant, because no one has complained more bitterly than the gentleman from Arkansas has about the incorrectness of these BAE estimates, and when he says that the letter from the Department satisfies him, it certainly ought to satisfy everybody else in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, first, I wish to say that this is a most propitious time and I cannot permit the opportunity to pass without saying a few words in tribute to the ranking member of the Committee on Agriculture, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], who has announced his intention to retire from the Congress at the expiration of his present term.

Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself and all of my constituents, the people of Louisiana, and I am sure I might say for all of the South and all of the other agricultural States of the United States, it is with deep regret that we have learned of the intention of our esteemed colleague and friend.

Mr. PACE came to the Seventy-fifth Congress in 1937, and while it was not possible for him to become a member of the Committee on Agriculture at that time, coming from an agricultural State and being intensely interested in matters pertaining to agriculture, it was not long before he attained his desire to be transferred to the Committee on Agriculture.

From that time on, due to his ability, his interest and knowledge of agricultural problems, his study and hard work and devotion to the subject, he rapidly advanced on the committee until last year he became the ranking majority member of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. PACE was so well informed on all matters pertaining to agriculture that many of the Members sought his counsel and advice, which he ungrudgingly gave, and since I have been a Member of Congress I have called upon him many times for information and advice and he never failed to advise and assist me in my work, and, representing an agricultural district, his guidance was most helpful and greatly appreciated.

Mr. Chairman, in the retirement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], his State, the Congress, and the Nation will lose a faithful and able legislator; agriculture will lose a learned and devoted champion, and especially we, the younger Members of the House will lose a true and solicitous friend, one who was never too busy to advise and help us.

Mr. Chairman, at this time, this country can ill afford to lose men of the type, character, and ability of such men as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], chairman of the Public Works Committee, who is also retiring this year.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARCADE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, as the next door neighbor and friend of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] and speaking for all of the people of our State, I express the hope that the gentleman may be induced to change his mind and continue his service here in this House where he is so badly needed.

Mr. LARCADE. I hope so, too.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARCADE. I yield to the gentleman from Lousiana.

Mr. BROOKS. As a Member of the House who came here during the same Congress which saw the beginning of the congressional career of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], I wish to join with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE], in his kind remarks with reference to STEVE PACE. I think he has been one of the most valuable men in the House of Representatives, and he certainly has been a tower of strength to Louisiana agriculture. I join with my friend from Georgia [Mr. COX] in the hope that he will reconsider and remain with us.

Mr. LARCADE. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARCADE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, as a new member on the great Committee on Agriculture, who has had the honor of serving on two important subcommittees presided over by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] I would like to say that he is the best example I have ever met of the fact that in Congress and elsewhere hard work and ability pay dividends.

Mr. LARCADE. I agree with the gentleman fully.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARCADE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I should just like to add my own personal and humble evaluation of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] whom I regard as one of my closest personal friends, who served here with me throughout these past 16 years. He is a valuable man. It is to be hoped that he will reconsider, because we in this House can ill afford to lose a man of the ability he possesses.

Mr. LARCADE. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, secondly, on yesterday I commented upon a meeting of cotton farmers held in my district, and submitted their recommendations in regard to amendment of the cotton-acreage-allotment law, and this morning I am in receipt of a further communication from my district and State on the subject, and wherein it is stated that—

> At the last State committee meeting we discussed the subject of inequitable cotton allotments that have been established on a number of Louisiana farms under the present law. We also discussed the relief that might be afforded by different proposals for amending the present law. We have just received a copy of House Joint Resolution 398, introduced by Mr. COOLEY on January 17, 1950. This resolution provides for increasing allotments to those farms which have in the past planted a large percentage of their cropland to cotton. For the sake of brevity we will call this the 70–50–40 provision. It will correct a number of the inequities under the present law but will not correct inequities existing on a substantial number of other farms.
> In the last State committee meeting we considered the case of a farmer who has 40 acres of cropland and only a 5-acre allotment. This farmer is just getting started in farming and is buying his farm through the Farmers Home Administration. This case is typical of quite a number of farmers which county committees believe are entitled to additional allotment.
> Mr. COOLEY's resolution does provide for the release of acreage allotments by farms which have more than they want but this released acreage must first be used to offset any increase in acreage allotments in the county because of the 70–50–40 provision. Then if there is any released acreage left after this has been done it may be used to correct inequities in allotments on other farms in the county. There are parishes in every section of Louisiana which will not be able to get farmers to release enough acreage to offset the increase in allotments provided by the 70–50–40 provision. These parishes will, therefore, have no acreage to reapportion to other farms. On the other hand a number of the parishes in the State will be able to obtain more released acreage than is needed to offset the increases because of the 70–50–40 provision and more than they will need to distribute to other farmers in the parishes which have inequitable allotments. We had hoped that the present law would be amended in a manner that would permit that part of the released acreage in any parish in excess of the needs of the parish to be transferred to other parishes which might need the acreage. In past years when farmers released acreage allotments they did not need, half of this released acreage stayed in the parish and half was turned in to the State committee. The State committee allocated its share of this released acreage back to the parishes in accordance with the need for the acreage.

Mr. Chairman, while I am certain that the Committee will resolve this matter under consideration to the best interests of all concerned, I am submitting the views of my constituents for your consideration, and I have full confidence in the decision which will be made to correct the problem to the fullest extent possible at this time.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee has just rejected an amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE], the purpose of which was to fix the responsibility for the determination of the amount of acreage allotted to the individual farmer in the hands of the county committee.

I think the amendment, had it been adopted in proper form, would have achieved the purpose of eliminating probably the grossest of the inequities that have crept into the allocation of acreage under the existing law. However, that amendment has been rejected. Therefore, may I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] a question in reference to the determination of the allocation under the bill as it now reads?

On page 2, line 5, appears the phrase "if the owner or operator of the farm applies in writing for the allotment authorized by this section and certifies that the acreage allotted will be planted to cotton."

What character of notice, if any, is the man who does not have the amount of acreage that this proposal here intends to give him going to get in order that he may make the application for the acreage that he will be allotted if this proposal becomes law?

Mr. PACE. That is covered by the letter I referred to, inserted by the gentleman from Arkansas. In the first instance, the committee will look to its records and see, for example, that the distinguished gentleman from Texas has only 50 percent of his 3-year average. They will then automatically mail to the gentleman from Texas as a cotton grower, if he should be, a notice that "according to our records you are entitled to an increased allotment of so many acres to bring you up to 70 percent. If you will come to this office and file a request for it with a declaration of intent to plant it, it will be allocated to you."

Mr. PICKETT. Will that notice go to every man who under the proposal we now have will get an increase in his acreage up to the point of the 70 percent or the 50 percent of his plantings?

Mr. PACE. That is true. The man who does not get an increase does not get that individual notice, but Mr. Woolley has agreed to direct the county committee to give wide publicity to the fact that the person who does not get an increase, if he is dissatisfied with his base acreage or allocation, may file an appeal immediately to the review committee. We have tried as best we know how, staying within the limits of reason, to correct the situation which has so greatly disturbed the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PICKETT. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not true, so that we may perfectly understand what the situation is, that the notice will go out to the individual farmer on the present listing, which generally is the BAE figures?

Mr. PACE. I said as much.

Mr. PICKETT. One further question: Under the terms of the resolution that is now pending, does not the county committee have the authority, if this becomes law, to make a determination in its own right of any amount of increase that the individual farmer is entitled to, and then send him a notice advising him that is the amount of acreage the committee figures he is entitled to, and invite him to come in and get it corrected by calling their attention to the fact that it is not correct, and appealing from it, if that be the case?

Mr. PACE. Certainly the local committee has the right to correct errors. It is contemplated that will be done. But it is not contemplated the local committee can make a wholesale revision of the base acreage in that county. It must be done by individual farms, and it must be done under the general supervision—get this straight, please—of the State committee. In every instance the action of the local committee is subject to review by the State committee.

Mr. PICKETT. Then you have a double-barreled review under this resolution, one by the review committee provided under section 3 of the bill, and the other by the State committee.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman did not follow my language closely. The action by the local committee is subject to review by the State committee. The action by the review committee is final.

Mr. PICKETT. I think the gentleman did not accurately follow my language because we do have two reviews on it, one of the county committee and one of the individual's allocation.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKETT. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not a fact that the way it will actually work under this resolution—the county committee must certify to the individual farmer 70 percent of his actual planting as listed in the office as his eligible allotment for the year?

Mr. PICKETT. That is my information concerning it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, there probably never has been in the history of the American Congress such a flood of propaganda directed against any piece of legislation affecting only one section of the country as has been directed against the central Arizona project, represented by S. 75 and H. R. 934. Members of Congress have been deluged with letters, newspaper and magazine articles—all expensive to disseminate, all cleverly written and most of it highly fallacious—intended to poison the minds of the Members against this pending legislation. In spite of this opposition, S. 75 has been amended and reported favorably.

The Bureau of Reclamation has made an exhaustive study of all phases of the central Arizona project and has found it feasible in every respect, and has recommended its authorization and construction. The Secretary of the Interior has so recommended.

The best engineers in the West favor this project. The Colorado River Basin States Committee, made up of outstanding authorities in the Western States, has spent many years studying California's objections and has taken positive action, finding against all of the California contentions. This authoritative committee adopted on October 2, 1947, a statement of principle refuting the California contentions and upholding the Arizona views.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the remarks of one of our Members who undoubtedly has been misled by the aforesaid propaganda. I am reading now from page 1130 of yesterday's RECORD in the first column near the bottom of the page. This is from the remarks of Congressman RICH, of Pennsylvania. I read:

> But think of it. It is going to cost $1,250,000,000 to put this land under cultivation, which will then cost you $1,600 an acre, and after you get the land it will be worth $200 an acre. Is that not asinine?

Mr. Chairman, if true, it is asinine. However, that one column contains more mathematical inaccuracies than I have ever seen on a printed page. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to pay no attention to decimal points or ciphers. A careful inspection of this speech will show that he has misplaced one or two or three ciphers as if they mean nothing. Where did he get this information?

Talk about putting cotton land in Arizona under irrigation at a cost of $1,600 which will afterward be worth only $200 an acre. He asks, "Is this asinine?" I'll say that is asinine, but I am sorry to say the asinine part of it, Mr. Chairman, is that the gentleman does not know his facts. He does not have his figures correct. If you consider a multiple-purpose project such as the central Arizona project is, and take the total cost of the project, of which irrigation is only one phase, and divide the number of acres to be watered into the total cost of the project and ignore the other features of the project, of course you get an asinine result. That may be mathematics but it is distorted and twisted.

I want to say to you southern gentlemen that we do have some surplus cotton in Arizona. Also we have been growing it on land which is included in the Arizona project bill, H. R. 934. But if we had had sufficient water in Arizona we would not have to plant so much of that land to cotton. Why not? Mind you, we grow vegetables, such as head lettuce, carrots, broccoli, cauliflower, and similar products, to say nothing of citrus, and grow them in a season when most of this country is covered with snow.

How many of you produce dates? Arizona produces 2,000,000 pounds of dates annually. It is a milion-dollar industry annually with us. Where in your State does the date palm flourish? When the Shah of Persia came to Arizona a few weeks ago, we took him out to Col. Dale Bumstead's ranch, west of Phoenix, and he got dates and other fruit that he could never eat from his own soil in Persia; better dates than grown any place in Arabia.

Most of our irrigation production yielding greatest revenue in that southwest country is not competitive. I heard a distinguished gentleman from Michigan say one time: "MURDOCK, I was amazed when I saw what you were producing down there, but what amazed me most was that it was not in competition with anything we grow in Michigan."

I said to the Congressman: "I would like to have you say that on the floor of the House. I have been trying to impress that fact."

Give us water for that land—Arizona's own water out of the Colorado River—and we will not grow cotton. We want to get away from cotton. We will grow crops that will bring in much greater revenue, and thus you will not be bothered with Arizona irrigated cotton land in any of these reclamation bills.

I earnestly request that the Members of this House do not permit themselves to be misled by the steady barrage of false and misleading propaganda to which they are being subjected, and I further request that each Member of this House study the record and familiarize himself with all of the above matters. I feel confident that any impartial mind studying this matter will recognize the truth and the soundness of Arizona's position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this measure to increase cotton-acreage allotments is an improvement over the present law.

But I want to warn the Congress now that you are starting out on a dangerous policy of regimenting the farmers of this country.

You have already virtually made a closed shop of peanut growing. The farmers of your districts as a rule cannot grow peanuts and sell them on the open market, unless they have been growing them for that purpose heretofore. As a result, you note a scarcity of them everywhere.

You have made a closed shop of tobacco growing, in order to raise the price of tobacco, and at the same time you have placed on embargo on exporting tobacco seed. It is a penitentiary offense to ship tobacco seed out of the United States. Here is the law; let me read it to you. It is—unlawful to export any tobacco seed and/or live tobacco plants from the United States or any Territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, to any foreign country, port, or place, unless such exportation and/or transportation is in pursuance of a written permit granted by the Secretary of Agriculture. Such permit shall be granted by the Secretary only upon application therefor and after proof satisfactory to him that such seed or plants are to be used for experimental purposes only.

SEC. 2. Any persons violating any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

You do not propose to have those people in foreign countries raise their own tobacco. The program seems to be to ship tobacco to foreign countries and pay for it out of the so-called Marshall plan—the Bevin plan—that is, out of the American taxpayers' pockets.

Now you are starting in to regiment the rest of the American farmers—beginning with the small cotton farmers.

No man in this Congress has worked harder than I have for the small farmers of this country. I do not hesitate to say that no other 10 men in this House have done more to electrify the farm homes of this country than I have—to extend to the farmers the benefits of cheap electricity.

Now Congress has embarked upon a program of regimentation that I fear will drive thousands of them from their fields.

Oh, I know some of you will say that this program has held cotton up. It did not do anything of the kind. It held it down. If cotton had gone to its normal value, as wheat did, in recent years, it would have gone to 75 cents or a dollar a pound.

Not a single one of you who has spoken on this measure has even referred to the currency, to the circulating medium of the United States, to the amount of money in circulation.

Prices, in a free country, are governed by two things: The volume of the Nation's currency multiplied by the velocity of its circulation.

In 1914, when cotton was 11 cents a pound, we had $3,450,000,000 in circulation.

In 1928, when cotton was 20 cents a pound normally—and I know what I am talking about, because I investigated the manipulation on the exchange at that time, and cotton went back up to 20 cents a pound and stabilized there. At that time we had less than $5,000,000,000 in circulation.

On August 31, 1949, we had $27,392,000,000 in circulation or more than five times as much as we had in 1928 when cotton was 20 cents a pound.

If the Government had kept its hands off the supply of cotton and off the cotton market, in my opinion it would have gone to 75 cents or a dollar a pound, at the time when wheat went to $3.75 a bushel and prices of other commodities reached a similar level.

No, you are regimenting the cotton growers, and I fear it will bring ruin to many little cotton farmers.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. For a question only.

Mr. WHITE of California. I should like to say to the gentleman that the public power group——

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I know what the gentleman is going to say; I will answer that at the proper time. I know the Power Trust does not like my attitude on public power, and on rural electrification.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Does the gentleman advocate the abolition entirely of the price-support program?

Mr. RANKIN. My opinion is that the so-called price-support program has had the effect of holding the price of cotton down instead of holding it up.

Human liberty is worth more than a fictitious price for cotton that somebody down in the Department of Agriculture from Pike's Peak proposes to fix.

Remember that this is but the beginning. I see now that they propose to fix the acreage of soybeans.

Then they propose to fix the acreage of wheat.

Now they are proposing to fix the acreage of corn.

Next they will tell you how many cows you can milk, how many eggs you can sell, how many chickens you can sell, how many beef cattle you can raise, how many hogs you can kill, how many potatoes you can raise.

This is one of the most dangerous programs of regimentation that we have ever embarked upon; and I am afraid it will result in doing the farmers more harm than good.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. This will be all right for those who have got some cotton, but where are you if you do not get in? And that is the trouble, there are many people who are not getting enough to earn a living out of this thing.

Mr. RANKIN. I see some of the fellows who have been raising the most sand here for this proposition are fixed all right; their counties have been raising over a hundred thousand bales of cotton.

The greatest thing in America is American freedom, American liberty; and if you let the price of cotton rise to the economic level justified by the circulating medium they will get more out of it in the long run than they will by regimenting them and driving the little farmer out of his field for the benefit of the man who farms by proxy.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. PACE. How, then, does the gentleman account for the fact that in his great State of Mississippi a larger percentage of the farmers voted for this program than in any other State?

Mr. RANKIN. Because they were told that this was the only way they could get a reasonable price. They were misled into it.

I am not in favor of making a closed shop of the peanut-growing industry.

I am not in favor of making a closed shop of the tobacco-growing industry.

I am not in favor of making a closed shop of the cotton-growing industry.

I am not in favor of driving the little man from his farm.

I am not in favor of making a closed shop of the soybean-growing industry.

I am not in favor of making a closed shop of the dairy industry.

I am not in favor of making a closed shop of the chicken-growing, or the egg-growing, or the livestock-growing industry.

In my opinion you are starting out on a program that is going to lead to the place the old British Empire has reached, the very depth of socialistic regimentation.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. The gentleman is a lawyer, is he not?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of California. Is not the law a closed shop?

Mr. RANKIN. No; you can get in court; I will take the gentleman into court any time he wants to go. All he has to do is to stand an examination to get licenses to practice law.

I call attention to the fact that Fresno County, the home county of the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE], produced 336,140 bales of cotton last year, or about 40 times as much as was produced by the average county in the average cotton-growing State.

I am protesting against what I think is a dangerous trend, and I think that when the folks realize what all this means there will be a reaction in this country that will wake the Congress up to a realization of the fact that the American people still believe in constitutional government.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. For 3 or 4 days now we have been working on what I call an un-American freedom bill, and I congratulate the gentleman for calling this a most important thing. This freedom is more valuable than regimentation.

Mr. RANKIN. Human freedom is more valuable than an extra acre of cotton for one man which is taken away from another.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. TACKETT. May I say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I am in accord with his statements. It will not be over 4 or 5 years, once we start on this road, when the farmer will be told exactly how many chickens he can raise, how many eggs he can grow, how many cows he can milk; it will not be long before the farmer's freedom is gone.

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES. The gentleman made a statement at the beginning of his discussion that there is a penalty for shipping tobacco seed out of the United States. Does the gentleman mean that they penalize a person for sending tobacco seed out of the country?

Mr. RANKIN. They send him to the penitentiary. I have just read you the law.

Mr. REES. Where does the gentleman get that idea?

Mr. RANKIN. Congress passed a law here to that effect.

Mr. REES. When was that?

Mr. RANKIN. In 1940.

Mr. REES. Then it is about time to repeal it.

Mr. RANKIN. That is up to Congress.

Mr. REES. Let us offer a bill to repeal that.

Mr. RANKIN. Any Member can do so.

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Regardless of the soundness of the gentleman's views, having gone along with a control program as long as we have, does the gentleman intend to vote for this resolution?

Mr. RANKIN. I said that this resolution is an improvement over the present law.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact there has been a bill introduced by me in the Congress several times to repeal this embargo on tobacco seed because I do not like to see them deceive the good women voters and all those other people.

Mr. RANKIN. I am more interested in protecting the liberties of the American people than I am in tobacco seed.

I am simply pointing out the extreme dangers of embarking upon a program of regimentation that may result in the destruction of that liberty and freedom our people have enjoyed for the last 300 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this attack on the farm program should go unnoticed. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] seems to overlook the fact that during the war we substantially increased production and expanded our agriculture. Production was geared to the wheels of war, and our farmers did a magnificent job. In fact, the world was amazed by the accomplishments of the American farmer, who with less labor, less machinery, less fertilizer, and less land in production broke all past records. In this transition period from war to peace, all segments of our economy have made major adjustments. We are now trying to provide the machinery which will enable our farmers to reduce production so as to bring production in line with reasonable consumer demand.

I want it clearly understood, and I have said this in every part of my own district—I hate and despise the very thought of regimenting farmers and of controlling American agriculture. I hope for the day when the farmers of our Nation can plant freely in the spring and harvest abundantly in the fall, with the knowledge and satisfaction that the products of their toil may be sold profitably in the market places of the world. I regard crop control only as a necessary expedient; it is not a solution to the problems which are now plaguing American agriculture. A real solution will only be found when we are able to expand our markets either at home or abroad for the products of our fields. At the present moment, however, every intelligent person knows that but for the support program, accompanied by the control program, the farmers of this Nation would today be in bankruptcy. If control of cotton had been defeated on December 15 in the referendum which was held that day, the support price on cotton would have dropped from 90 percent of parity to 50 percent of parity, or $50 a bale. As pointed out here on Friday, and in the course of the debate on this resolution, the Government will soon have on hand from 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 bales of cotton. Had cotton dropped $50 a bale, the Government would stand to suffer a loss of from $400,000,000 to $450,000,000, to say nothing about bankrupting the cotton farmers of the Nation and destroying their purchasing power.

It is easy to cry out about regimentation, but the farmers of my district and State are not alarmed by such cries. The farmers of my district and State like this program, which enables them to control production and enables them to take advantage of the price-support program. On many occasions they have approved control programs with a vote of from 90 to 98 percent. They do not need anyone from Mississippi or from the west coast or from elsewhere to warn them about regimentation. They have common sense enough to know what they are doing, and they know full well that they are not being regimented.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Not at this time.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to read some facts to the gentleman.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman may read them later. These control programs and these support programs mean the difference between prostration and prosperity in the section of the country I come from. They have been approved in one referendum and plebiscite after another, and yet we hear them attacked. Now the newspapers say that this is a raid on the Treasury. That is an infamous charge; it is a false statement. It is not a raid on the Treasury. This is an effort on our part to right a wrong which has been done unwittingly to the cotton farmers of this country. No one in this House ever contemplated that this law would result in such inequities and in such unfair treatment. All of us did the best we could to provide machinery so that the burden would fall evenly and uniformly upon the cotton farmers of the country, and yet we found out when the mechanics were set in operation in the field that injustice was being done here and there and throughout the Cotton Belt.

This is an effort to do justice, and that is the only reason it is here. There is not a man on my committee that is actuated by any desire to increase the acreage of cotton. We have already reduced it by law from 27,000,000 acres to 21,000,000 acres, and even with this amendment nobody would suggest that we will exceed the 21,000,000-acre minimum provided in the law.

When we can provide machinery which will bring about an equitable and a fair reduction, then the farmers of the cotton country are perfectly willing to take the gaff and to reduce production and to keep on reducing production until we can dispose of the surpluses now hanging over the market. We do not even now have a dangerous oversupply of cotton. It is less than we have had on hand in 7 out of the last 10 years. It is far less than we had when we went into World War II, and the Government has not lost one red copper cent on this cotton program, newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding. Today we have a profit in excess of $200,000,000 and a reserve set aside to take care of potential losses which might be involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON: On page 1, line 9, strike out "70" and insert "60."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 10 minutes, with 5 minutes to be reserved to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BROOKS. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I am anxious that the very excellent record with respect to cotton under the Agricultural Adjustment Act be maintained. One of the best ways to promote the continuance of that record is to prevent, as far as possible, the accumulation of surpluses in peacetime which cannot be disposed of as readily as they were disposed of in time of war.

The resolution under consideration provides that not less than 70 percent of the acreage, according to its terms, for the 3 years mentioned should be planted to cotton. I offer an amendment to substitute for that 70 percent 60 percent.

The Committee on Agriculture was very fair. The chairman invited all of the Members of Congress from the Cattle Belt to appear before it prior to reporting this bill. I repeat here what I said to the committee, that in view of the past history of the agricultural program, and particularly cotton, in view of the fact that 60 percent, with modifications, obtained under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, it does occur to me that the fundamental purpose of this bill to correct and ameliorate injustices and hardships can be accomplished by continuing the program substantially as it has been administered for some years prior to 1942, when allotments were removed on account of war.

There is no occasion to incur the danger of increasing present and future surpluses by increasing the 60 percent that has heretofore obtained to 70 percent. It is estimated by the Department of Agriculture that this bill will add 1,400,000 acres to the allotments already made. While the bill stipulates that these additional allotments are only for 1950 and shall not be considered in the future determination of allotments, permit me to say that even a temporary allotment once made will plague the Congress and plague the Department in future adjustments of those allotments.

Inasmuch as there is nothing in the debates, and nothing in the report of the committee on this bill, to indicate that 60 percent of the 3 years mentioned will not provide for the hardship cases, I do urge that to protect the long-range view of the cotton program we profit by the experiences of the past and not take a chance further to increase the surpluses that may result in the destruction not only of the cotton program, if surpluses continue to pile up, but all of the programs of other agricultural products.

I therefore urge that this amendment to substitute for the 70 percent the 60 percent that has substantially obtained heretofore be adopted because I believe that if the House adopts it it will provide substantially for the alleviation of all hardship cases that have been brought to the attention of either the Committee on Agriculture or of the House in the debates. Just as surely as 1,400,000 acres will ameliorate the conditions generally, this provision for 60 percent will ameliorate substantially all the hardship cases and will materially reduce the acreage to be added by the preceding bill.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ALBERT. Would the gentleman be willing to make this provision retroactive to the allotments that have already been issued?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I would not. Provident farmers, good farmers, are making their preparations and have been making them since the 1st of January 1950 and since the harvesting of the 1949 crops for the allotted crops of 1950. Where cotton is being planted in the Rio Grande Valley, where preparations are under way, throughout the cotton belt, where any good farmer has made his preparations for his crop of 1950, farmers will be further disturbed by this or any other legislation. The cotton program will be injured instead of helped by opening up all the allotments made under the act of 1949. The bill should be limited to hardship cases.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is an important amendment. Last fall before the referendum was held on December 15, I assembled the cotton subcommittee here in Washington in the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of discussing the problems involved and which would be involved in the event the referendum were lost. We explored every possibility within the framework of the law now on the books in an effort to alleviate the suffering and hardships and to prevent inequities.

After two or three different conferences about it, we concluded that it would be necessary to have legislative enactment, so as chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture I issued a statement to the effect that when Congress convened I would introduce a resolution substantially in the form of the resolution now under consideration. That was done for the purpose of giving the farmers some assurances that the inequities would be eliminated as far as possible within the 70-percent provision.

I do not know and no one else will ever know to what extent that statement issued by the chairman of your committee influenced the decision of the farmers. But in an effort to keep faith with the farmers I believe the House should stand by and hold up the hands of our committee in bringing this 70-percent provision to the House for consideration. To reduce that 70 percent to 60 percent now would certainly be a breach of faith on my part and on the part of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY] and the others who have seriously and conscientiously considered this matter and have assured farmers that something would be done to correct the situation.

I want to call your attention to one other thing. If the farmer's reported acreage had been accepted, a reduction of 29 percent in plantings was taken before we even started to reduce. Then we reduced that 23 percent, so over all the present program calls for a 52-percent reduction below reported acreage. Even under this bill a farmer may be reduced in his plantings 30 percent and under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] 40 percent. We have not asked industry to reduce its output to any such degree. We have not asked labor to cease work and to be idle 40 percent of the time without pay.

How can we in good conscience ask the cotton farmer to take such drastic action as is contemplated by the Whittington amendment?

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman indicate what the general reduction is over the Nation in the cotton acreage?

Mr. COOLEY. Twenty-three percent.

Mr. FISHER. And if the 70-percent provision is put in here it would provide a 30-percent reduction and that would still be below the national average.

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. The 23-percent reduction is over the 1949 acreage and this 30-percent reduction is over the 1946–48 average which was far below the 1949 acreage. The reduction here is with respect to the 1949 acreage and is much more than 30 percent.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman is correct. That means hardship for many farmers and it makes the reduction that much more severe.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. Is it not also a matter of fact that under this proposed amendment it will develop that the little man will have his throat cut and the big man will be helped?

Mr. COOLEY. I think it might tend to have that effect. It is an important amendment and especially important in view of the fact that the House Committee on Agriculture, as far as it was within its power to do so, has given the farmers the assurance that the committee would try to provide the 70-percent floor below which their acreage should not be reduced. To reduce it now below 70 percent I think would impose a general hardship. and would actually be cruel. Some people come here and say even under the present law, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], said a moment ago, we are driving the cotton farmers from the fields. You hear that in one breath and now another distinguished gentleman from Mississippi proposes to really drive them from the fields. I think when we call on them to make the reduction that is here contemplated that is about as far as we should go.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I have taken this time to say something in reference to the situation prevailing in my own State. I have heard the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] in reference to the farm program. I can go along to this extent. I believe our farm program is gradually moving into a crisis. I believe that these surpluses are gradually pushing us to the point where we must give thought for some change and perhaps some more drastic remedy, if it can be found to meet the situation which is piling up.

I read last night and this morning of the huge pile of potatoes being purchased by the Department of Agriculture, and of the dilemma of the Department as to whether or not it should color those potatoes blue to make them unpalatable or inedible; whether they should put them out in the frost and let them freeze and become nonedible; whether they should try to use them for cattle feed or for other purposes.

I read with a great deal of concern a statement which I knew to be a fact, that this Department has made every effort to sell those potatoes, even at the price of 1 cent per hundred pounds. Anybody who reads about that situation knows that we are moving into an agricultural crisis in this country. It may be only 1 year, it may be 2 years, or it may be 3 years before it comes, but just as sure as we sit in this Chamber day by day, this country is going to face an agricultural crisis, due to the enormous surpluses being piled up. We must face it either now or farther on down the road.

But, coming specifically to this bill, the thing that concerns me is not section 1, as much as it is section 2. The State of Louisiana, for a small State territorily, is unusual, I think, in reference to the fact that it has a large number of basic crops. For instance, there is sugar, rice, strawberries, sweetpotatoes, and, of course, cotton—all basic crops produced in large quantities in our State.

When this acreage was allotted to the various States and was then reallotted to the parishes in the State of Louisiana, it is my judgment that perhaps too much of the cotton acreage went to areas producing rice or sugar, or perhaps down in the coastal country, which produces muskrat furs, and industries of that sort, where it is not needed, and to little of it went into the cotton-producing areas of both south and north Louisiana, where it is needed. As a result, our cotton farmers are in trouble. Too many of them are being drastically reduced. But section 2, which covers the unused acreage, should give us some relief. It should allow us to take acreage from the noncotton production section of the State which produces rice and sugar and move that acreage over to the cotton-producing sections and give our people the relief which we need so badly.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. ALBERT. I agree with the point of view which the gentleman is expressing; but if he thinks section 2 does that, he had better study it again and read the report on it.

Mr. BROOKS. That is exactly what we need. We need an unfreezing of the frozen, unused allotments. This section should be amended so as to permit this to be done.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. As long as the gentleman gets the relief, he does not care from what source it comes, does he?

Mr. BROOKS. We want it from this particular bill, however, because we are in trouble.

Mr. WHITE of California. Under this bill, he would get relief under the 70-percent provision; but if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] prevails, it will be cut down by 10 percent.

Mr. BROOKS. I think I understand the gentleman's amendment, and I thank the gentleman very much for his observation in that respect.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Whatever may be said of the amendment, it will certainly reduce the surplus that the gentleman has mentioned, without doing an injustice to anybody.

Mr. HARRIS. Could the gentleman advise us how much it would reduce the surplus?

Mr. BROOKS. We are face to face with a critical situation. We have already authorized the allocation of the acreage, and we have passed the law which is inequitable. We have to get ourselves out of the hole we dug. This bill is the only means whereby we can do it at the present time. It will help to some extent. It is not perfect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, all of us close to the American farmer are sympathetic with the problems he is now facing in trying to regear his operations to a safe, peacetime basis. Under present circumstances, the farmer looks to Congress for help in doing this job. But as long as we continue to bypass the real problems the farmer is facing—as we are today in this discussion of the so-called injustice and inequities resulting from the cotton legislation enacted last fall—we are neglecting our responsibility to the American farmer and all of our people.

By itself, the acreage allotment is only a temporary remedy. Control always breeds trouble. When Congress provides no other measures to help farmers maintain their income, allotments only force farmers, first, to use more and more modern agricultural technology to increase yields on the allotted acreage; and, second, to plant larger acreages of crops not under allotment. The result is still surplus. The structure of the crop price-support program is not indestructible. As important as the crop price-support program is to the American farmer and to our whole economy, Congress should not lay the groundwork for its destruction by continually failing to recognize the root of evil of today's agricultural problems.

We can help the farmer permanently if we recognize the basic problems in agriculture and stop bypassing them. We can help the farmer maintain a high income without loading the Nation with crops the consumer does not want, and without huge expenditures by the Federal Government to purchase surplus crops in its price-support program. In addition, the help Congress can provide will enable farmers to speed up their soil and water conservation programs and cut out the waste of our precious topsoil, waste which is not only destroying the productive capacity of agriculture but which is contributing to flood damage, reservoir and water supply destruction, and a lower standard of living for all of our people.

This can be done cheaply, comparatively speaking, and easily—but only if we begin at the source of our trouble, with Mother Earth herself. Nature laid down certain laws for land use which we cannot ignore if we want our agriculture to remain productive. Present surpluses result from our ignoring these laws of nature. If all of our cropland were used in accordance with minimum soil- and water-conserving rotations, we would have at least 43,500,000 acres less of row crops, such as cotton, in the crop year of 1950. Minimum soil-conserving rotations and good land use would have put more of our cropland in grass, meadow, hay land, and woodland. Forage would have been produced for the production of livestock—more beef for the Nation's dinner table, instead of surplus crops.

Mr. Chairman, the No. 1 need of the Nation's farmer today is help to gear his production to meet all of the food and fiber needs of our people and at the same time help him to conserve his soil and water resources. This need can and must be met. Congress can help do its part by directing that $100,000,000 of the nearly $300,000,000 now being alloted to farmers annually for conservation practices be used to help them regear their production to peacetime needs in addition to a $100,000,000 annual appropriation for that purpose.

H. R. 2368, the Soil Conservation Act of 1949, which I introduced last year, provides the guidance and legislative framework to provide assistance to farmers to help them correct the problems of surplus in certain crops. Land use conversion payments are provided which will encourage farmers to use more of their land now contributing to surplus for the production of crops for which there is greater demand.

By using $200,000,000 annually for land-use conversion payments, as provided in H. R. 2368 over 47,000,000 additional acres of land could be converted from soil-depleting crops to soil-conserving crops in the next 6 years. This would take a great part of the surplus pressure off of our crop price-support program.

Specifically, H. R. 2368 would use appropriated funds for conservation payments for three types of payments to farmers to encourage proper land use, land-use conversion, and conservation of our agricultural resources.

Class A payments are provided to avoid surpluses from overuse of the land. Payments would be made to assist farmers convert the use of their land that has been for the previous two or more years in grain, row, and other soil-depleting crops.

Class B payments would be made to help farmers defray the cost of applying certain permanent or semipermanent soil- and water-conservation measures. Generally, these class B payments would be made only once.

Class C payments would be made annually as an added incentive to encourage farmers to hold their topsoil through proper land use, and other recurring soil- and water-conservation practices.

There are other important segments to H. R. 2368 which time does not permit me to mention. The most important thing is, however, that the provisions of this bill do offer a solution to our present agricultural problems. Many Congressmen, organizations, and individuals agree with its purpose and contents. Many members of the House Agricultural Committee favor H. R. 2368.

The provisions of this bill would erase the problems encountered in the cotton legislation now in question. The corn and wheat surplus is also facing us. Corn farmers are now being asked to reduce corn acres by 20 percent.

And most basic of all, more of our soil and water resources would be held on the land where they can serve our people best.

I therefore urge that before Congress attempts to patch up this cotton legislation, it first deal with helping farmers convert the use of their land and apply effective soil- and water-conservation measures, both of which are in the first order of things to help farmers regear their operations to a peacetime basis.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENSEN. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. We are told that within the next few years we shall have to retire about 30,000,000 acres of land from the growing of crops that are now being produced. Does the gentleman have any idea as to what use we can make of those lands when they are retired from the production of crops now being grown?

Mr. JENSEN. Certainly. The gentleman knows that we have a shortage of grass lands; we have a shortage of hay land. Every farm in America should have 2 or 3 acres of woodland.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman means that these retired acres should go into dairy- or beef-cattle production.

Mr. JENSEN. That would be very fine, yes; because we have an undersupply. The oleo bill, of course, did not help this situation at all; it just hurt it in every respect.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Any part of the acreage allotted to individual farms in any county for 1950 under the provisions of section 344 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, which will not be planted to cotton and which is voluntarily surrendered by the owner or operator of the farm to the county committee shall be deducted from the allotments to such farms and shall be apportioned, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, to other farms in the same county receiving allotments to the extent necessary to provide for such farms the allotments authorized by section 1 of this act. If any acreage remains after providing such allotments, it may be apportioned in amounts determined by the Secretary to be fair and reasonable to other farms in the same county receiving allotments which the Secretary determines are inadequate. In any subsequent year, unless hereafter provided by law, acreage surrendered under this section and reallocated pursuant to applications and certifications filed in accordance with the provisions of section 1 shall be credited to the State and county.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask for the record, in order that we may understand just how this section will work in its application, the following question, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee about a particular situation which, of course, would be applicable to all other cases. We have a farmer who has a 3-year average planting of 400 acres. He has total cropland of about 880 acres. He is in a low-factor county and received an allocation because of being in a low-factor county of 101 acres, which was 11.5 percent of his total cropland. In the adjustment out of the reserve the county committee allotted to him 66 acres in addition to his 101 acres which gives him at the present time an allocation of 167 acres. Under this resolution, he would be entitled to 70 percent of his planting in 1946, 1947, and 1948, which would be an average of 400 acres, resulting in 280 acres. That would be within the 40-percent provision of the total cropland. This man, incidentally, has 16 families on his farm and if he does not get some relief many of the families are going to have to move. They will join many other fine people, perhaps, and have to move to the city where many will finally wind up on the dole or relief rolls. You talk about helping the little man. Here is a case that is actually before the committee now.

What would be the actual working, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, of the 66 additional acres that were given to him in his adjustment?

Mr. COOLEY. I thought that in the illustration used he had already been given the 66 acres.

Mr. HARRIS. Had he not been given the 66 acres he would still have been entitled to the 280 acres under this resolution, which would be 70 percent of his average 3-year planting. Will the 66 acres be taken into consideration of the 280 acres that he will get under this resolution?

Mr. COOLEY. It will be taken into consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. In other words, the county committee will not reclaim that 66 acres in order to further correct inequities with other farmers in the country?

Mr. COOLEY. This resolution does not contemplate taking away any acreage which has heretofore been allotted, but the committee will take into consideration the adjustment which has already been made, which has tended to bring him up to his 70 percent, and if it has not brought him to 70, then it will give him acreage up to 70 percent.

Mr. HARRIS. In other words, the 66 acres was taken out of the county reserve to help correct the gross inequity done to this man.

Mr. COOLEY. That is correct.

Mr. HARRIS. The county committee will not get that 66 acres back to further correct existing inequities?

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman realizes that we cannot unscramble that egg. We would be here until Christmas making allotments if we tried to unscramble that egg.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not trying to unscramble the egg. I am trying to know what happens to the reserve and the maladjustment claimed by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PACE. If the gentleman will let things stay where they are, to those that do not now have 70 percent we will give it to them. Period.

Mr. HARRIS. I am merely trying to clear up the matter so that the farmers will know where they stand when this resolution, if it is finally adopted, passes.

Mr. COOLEY. I think the gentleman has it cleared up, and I think his understanding is correct. No allotment will be recalled.

Mr. HARRIS. I did want that cleared up so that we will know what the situation is.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of getting a little information on section 2 of the bill, if I may have the attention of the chairman.

As I understand, section 2 provides that after an allotment of acreage is made to a cotton farmer, and he does not use all of his allotment, it can be used by other farmers in the county through the operation of the county committee, if it is surrendered voluntarily to the county committee; is that correct?

Mr. COOLEY. That is right.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Now, assuming that the farmer who has been planting 200 acres of cotton only received an allotment of 100 acres, and decided to plant 60 acres, that would leave 40 acres that he may turn over to the county committee. As I understand section 2, as it is written, if he does that, then the 40 acres that he surrendered he will lose altogether in future calculations.

Mr. COOLEY. That is correct.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I wanted to get that clear.

Mr. COOLEY. He will lose it, but if it is reallocated to another farmer who certifies that he intends to plant it, then the county does not lose it and it is considered in future calculations in determining the county allotment, but not the individual farmer.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. But the farmer himself loses that if he surrenders it voluntarily.

Mr. COOLEY. That is right.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Suppose he does not use it and refuses to surrender it voluntarily, then he maintains his acreage allotment for next year?

Mr. COOLEY. He still does not have a vested interest in it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Well, as I understand, there has to be a voluntary surrender. What happens if he does not use the acreage allocation but refuses to surrender it?

Mr. COOLEY. It will remain as part of the history of his farm.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Exactly.

Mr. COOLEY. If he does not plant it, it is lost, anyway, unless he plants once in every 3 years. He can do that.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. But he will not still have it for his 1951 crop.

Mr. COOLEY. No.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. I do not know that the use of the word "loses" is entirely correct, because he does not lose anything if he planted cotton in one of the last 3 years. You do not have to plant cotton but once every 3 years.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I understand.

Mr. PACE. However, if he surrenders this acreage, it does not cost him a thing in the world, unless 1950 is the third year. But if he planted cotton in 1948, he can surrender this acreage, and it does not cost him, and he does not lose one inch. The only thing that would happen is that his county would lose that much history, because the cotton allocation is made on a percent of cropland.

The section here states:

In any subsequent year, unless hereafter provided by law, acreage surrendered under this section and reallocated pursuant to applications and certifications filed in accordance with the provisions of section 1 shall be credited to the State and county.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. And taken away from the man who has voluntarily surrendered it.

Mr. PACE. It does not say the latter part; it says that the county and the State shall maintain the history of the acreage that is planted after being reallocated.

Mr. ALBERT. Is not this the situation: If the man does not intend to plant it, whether he surrenders it or whether he keeps it he loses that year's history. But, if he surrenders it, his county maintains that history. Is not that the situation? If he does not plant it, he loses his 1950 history.

Mr. PACE. The only time the farm history is significant is that he cannot ever get a greater allotment than he has been planting in cotton. He can plant 1 acre and maintain himself as a cotton grower, but that 1 acre would be all he would get if he did that for 3 years. But if he plants his entire allotment in 1 year, then he gets his percent of the cropland as everybody else does.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I do not think there will be any land surrendered, for the 1950 crop will be the most profitable crop that can be produced.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I would like some comment on this. If he surrenders 10 acres this year, 1950, and goes back to his county committee in 1951, assuming that the national acreage and the county acreage do not change in 1951, would he be privileged to get 10 acres in 1951?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman from Georgia has stated that he would be entitled to receive it.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I would like to have that answered specifically.

Mr. ABERNETHY. He would if he planted in either 1947 or 1948.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I hope every cotton farmer will now understand the situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 363 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, any farmer who is dissatisfied with his farm-acreage allotment for the 1950 cotton crop may, within 15 days after mailing to him of notice as provided in section 362 of that act, or within 15 days after the effective date of this resolution, whichever date is later, have such allotment reviewed in accordance with the provisions of said act.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTEN: On page 3, following line 22, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 3A. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any farmer who shows to the satisfaction of the Secretary that he has been directly engaged in the growing of cotton as his principal means of support during the years 1946, 1947, 1948 as a renter, either as a cash tenant, share tenant, or sharecropper, and that through no fault of his own the land which he has been farming is no longer available to him for farming purposes shall, if he obtains other farm land to rent or farm for which no 1950-cotton allotment has been established, be eligible to receive for such land a cotton allotment in 1950. Such allotment shall be established on the same basis as allotments are established for other farms in the county on which cotton was not planted in 1946, 1947, or 1948, except that the acreage required to provide the allotments authorized under this section shall be in addition to the county, State, and National acreage allotments proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the 1950 crop of cotton and the production from such acreage shall be in addition to the national marketing quota for such crops."

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the members of this committee are splendid gentlemen. They are able and have worked hard on this farm program. Notwithstanding that effort, the bill we passed we now find contains certain inequities insofar as the landowner is concerned. The resolution before you today is an attempt to correct those inequities insofar as the landowner is concerned. These changes are needed. The legislative committee gave me the opportunity of appearing before them in support of these changes. However, this resolution still makes no provision for the farmer who does not own cotton land or farm land. If the man has made his living all his life as a renter or a sharecropper, and if he is put off the land which he has been renting or sharecropping due to the fact that his landlord has had his acreage reduced, he is being put on the streets and the public highways; he is put on relief when there is no relief; he is put on social security when he is not covered by social security. I say to you in my little town there are people now who have worked all their lives growing cotton for a living. They know no other trade. They are dependent upon their ability to rent land with a cotton allotment. And because a man who owns the land does not have enough of an allotment for the tenants that he has retained, those people are deprived of a means of making a living, the means that they have followed all their lives, and they are being deprived of it by an act of Congress.

I have conferred with the Committee on Agriculture with regard to this deplorable state of affairs. They are here today trying to further relieve the problems of the landowner, and I am strong for the passage of this resolution. I have heard them come down to the well of the House and unintentionally refer to the fact that they are taking care of every cotton farmer. They are not. They are taking care of every landowner who farms cotton. I say that any bill or any Federal law which says to an American citizen, "Although you have farmed cotton all your life, and although you do not know how to do anything else for a living, today, because you cannot rent land or get land to work as a sharecropper; because you cannot do those things, you cannot plant a stalk of cotton in 1950."

The gentlemen on this committee are going to point out that if this amendment is adopted it will be hard to work out. That is true. I have no pride of authorship. I went to the committee and had the clerks work out this amendment in an effort to keep those things at a minimum. If this amendment is adopted, I say to the committee here and now that when it goes to the other body or when it is in conference, if it can be improved to try to bring about what I am seeking, then I welcome those additions.

But I say to you to the Members of the House, whether or not you are from cotton areas to investigate whether you should not adopt this amendment before you deprive many of our citizens of a right to make any kind of living. It is tough to reduce cotton acreage to the landowner. I know it is tough. The cotton farmers are going to try as much as they can to retain the tenants who have lived on their farms. But if the man has 30 tenants or 30 sharecroppers and by law we cut down his acreage and he reduces his renters to 25, what are the other 5 going to do? They cannot go to another landowner and get land to farm cotton. No, they cannot do that because he has had his acreage cut and he is having trouble taking care of the tenants he has.

Oh, we talk about FEPC and we talk about the Federal Government taking away the rights of the individual by saying who can work and who cannot. Is it not worse to say by Federal law that those who have been so unfortunate as not to have owned cotton land and who have worked at cotton growing all their lives as renters or sharecroppers shall not have the right to follow the livelihood that they have followed all their lives on even a reduced basis?

My amendment provides that any renter or sharecropper who has farmed cotton for the base period and who is forced off the land he has been renting and who cannot rent other land with a cotton allotment, may have land he does rent classified as a new farm and have not less than 5 acres of cotton.

The members of the legislative committee say this would be hard to work out. We must work it out for it is not right by Federal law to deprive our citizens of the right to follow the only work they know. This amendment does not tie the cotton acreage to the man rather than the land—but unless we recognize this inequity and do something about it such fact could lead to losing the whole program.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that while I was having lunch downstairs with Dr. Montgomery, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] took me to task on the figures I gave yesterday as to the cost of building that big dam in the Colorado River, $1,250,000,000, and the land that they would be able to irrigate to raise more cotton would cost $1,600 an acre, and after you got it you would only have land that was worth $200 an acre.

The gentleman from Arizona will find out that those figures are not very far off, when you come to take proper recognition of that legislation, if it ever comes to the floor. I hope it never passes this Congress.

I am very much interested in a news article from Springfield, Mo.:

NOT "HARMLESS SCREWBALLS," RESPONSIBLE OFFICERS THREATEN UNITED STATES SYSTEM, SAYS COTTON CHIEF

(By William J. Fox)

MEMPHIS, TENN., January 23.—It's not "harmless screwballs" but responsible officials who threaten America's free enterprise, the president of National Cotton Council said today.

Harold A. Young, of North Little Rock, Ark., told some 1,000 cotton men at the council's twelfth annual meeting here that officials conference rooms and congressional rostrums have replaced the soap box.

"The danger is no longer a matter of foreign political idealism, soap-box oratory, or amusing and harmless screwballs," he said.

"Ideas, plans, and programs once associated only with wild-eyed radicals on street corners have become serious proposals, aggressively pushed by groups and individuals who occupy positions of prestige and influence," he said.

"They are being introduced in our National Congress in the form of specific legislative proposals inspired and actively supported by high administrative officials."

Young said the cotton council must adopt as its goal better understanding between agriculture and industry "in their survival against the inroads of soft socialism and big government."

"Never has a cotton industry problem been more urgent," he said. "If today's trend is allowed to continue unchecked we undoubtedly shall awake one day to find ourselves existing in a socialistic state."

Young said the cotton industry needs mainly private initiative and customers with money.

"Given such conditions throughout the past," he said, "America has outproduced, outsold, and outconsumed every other nation on earth."

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert this article and two others in my remarks at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to secure that permission in the House.

Mr. RICH. Very well. I will put them in later if I can get that permission.

Then I want to call attention to this vast potato destruction that is under study. If you will read that article in the Washington Post this morning, how this administration is trying to figure out some way to destroy the potato crop, and then you see what the Department of Agriculture is doing, the man who wrote this article about the screwballs has something to consider. You Members of Congress have something to consider when you are talking about these subsidies and the way you are trying to handle the surpluses by paying the farmers to raise more potatoes, then figuring out how you are going to destroy them. Now you are trying to figure out how you are going to pay the farmers more money for not raising cotton. I wonder if your heads do not swirl around. I wonder what kind of gray matter is in the heads.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. Does the gentleman realize that the potato program which he is making so much noise about is one which was adopted by the Eighteith Congress?

Mr. RICH. Oh, you would like to say something about the Eightieth Congress. If you had not had that Eightieth Congress you would have been sunk long ago. You fellows who are trying to laud some of these other Congresses get up and laugh about that Eightieth Congress. That Congress has saved this country for a couple of years longer, but if you go on with the program you are trying to initiate, you are going into socialism, and nothing under God's heaven will stop you. You are on the socialistic road and the road to bankruptcy.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. BECKWORTH. You mentioned the fact that there is a move on foot to destroy potatoes. I think the gentleman would be very interested, and I think the membership of this committee would be very interested to know that probably not more than 2 percent of the potato producers received all of that money that you heard about.

Mr. RICH. Well, who got the money?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Only 2 percent of it.

Mr. RICH. Who got the money?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Two percent of the potato producers.

Mr. RICH. Who got the money? Your Government has lost it. You are squandering so much that you do not even know where it is going. Now, you had better wake up and get your eyes open, because you will be wrecked pretty soon if you do not.

[From the Washington Post of January 31, 1950]

VAST POTATO DESTRUCTION UNDER STUDY

(By John W. Ball)

The Department of Agriculture is considering engaging in the greatest deliberate wholesale destruction of food in history in the next few weeks.

The Commodity Credit Corporation, food-buying agency for the Government's farm price support programs, has to buy and get rid of around 50,000,000 bushels of late potatoes within that time.

It has tried several methods to dispose of them. It has offered them free to the national school-lunch program, which has taken all it can use; to Federal, State, and local public and charitable institutions, to local charities, and to the Indian Bureau, without success. It also has offered unlimited amounts to charities sending food to hungry areas abroad. It has offered to sell the potatoes at 1 cent a hundred pounds for export by commercial exporters—sacked in bags that alone cost 12 to 15 cents apiece.

ALTERNATIVES LISTED

The only alternative to destroying the spuds is to convert them to commercial alcohol, starch, cattle feed, or potato flour. This would cost an additional sum for shipping them to the plants for conversion.

Methods of destruction considered are soaking them with oil and burning them, soaking them with chemicals and coloring matter to make them unfit for human consumption, or dumping them where they will freeze and rot and later plowing them underground.

The farm law of 1949—sometimes called the Anderson Act for its author, Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, Democrat, of New Mexico, former Secretary of Agriculture, directs CCC to support the price of potatoes at 60 percent of parity.

HAS SPENT $30,000,000

This means about $2.10 per 100 pounds, or roughly about $1.25 a bushel.

CCC already has spent about $30,000,000 on the 1949 crop. It still has to buy forty-five to fifty million bushels—about half in one county, Aroostook County, Maine.

Those already bought have been disposed of as follows:

About 1,800,000 bags (100 pounds) or 3,000,000 bushels, to direct distribution. This includes free disposal to the national school lunch, Government and charitable institutions.

About 8,200,000 bags or 13,600,000 bushels, sold at 1 cent per 100 pounds for livestock feed. In many cases the Government paid freight charges on this amounting to many times the total price it got.

About 2,000,000 bags to starch, glucose, and potato flour mills—also with freight subsidized by the Government.

Before it gets through CCC expects to lose between ninety-five and one hundred million dollars on the 1949 potato crop. This amounts to about $275,000 a day for each day of 1949—or $8,200,000 a month.

(This is about 50 percent more than the $62,000,000 cost of the entire legislative branch of the Government in 1949. It is about the same as the annual cost of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.)

Even at this terrific cost it is less than half the cost of a year ago. In the crop year ending last June it cost the taxpayers more than $225,000,000 to keep the domestic price of potatoes high. One result of the high prices was a reduced consumption. The per capita use of potatoes last year dropped to only 106 pounds—the lowest in history, and about 15 percent below recent years.

Last year millions of bushels of potatoes were converted to commercial alcohol and potato flour. Part of this was delivered to the armed services for use in occupied areas.

In carrying out the price-support program CCC is obeying definite orders of Congress. Up until a few weeks ago CCC estimated the potato program would cost around $60,000,000. However, the production of late potatoes was far greater than earlier estimates.

CCC agrees to take over the surplus potatoes whenever the growers are ready to deliver—limited only by its means of disposing of them. Recently, particularly in Maine, growers have offered delivery.

Their supplies had been held in the hope that they could get more than the Government guarantee on the open market. The greater production than expected, however, held prices down to about the price-support level.

Recently some of the potatoes are reportedly showing signs of deteriorating in farm storage. This has forced many farmers to offer them to CCC.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill. It has been very thoroughly explained by the very able members of the Committee on Agriculture, but I should like to point out to my fellow Members of the House how this legislation will remedy some of the inequities of the administration of the present law in my own district. The counties in my district are largely cotton and peanut growing sections and this bill is aimed directly at the evils in the present administration. For instance, there has been much demand made upon me that the present law is wrong in that it forbids the transfer of frozen acres. I mean by that, allotted-cotton acreage under the present law be released back to the county committee for reallocation. A number of my farmers have complained about such restriction and I am especially pleased that the committee has included such a corrective provision as is provided in section 2 of this bill.

We all realize that Congress did not intend to reduce cotton allotments more than 30 percent when it passed the bill last year. Yet I found to my sorrow that some farmers in my district had been reduced as much as 92 percent and most of them more than 50 percent. This slash in their acreage will cause them to be unable not only to pay their taxes on their farms but they simply will not be able, unless this bill is passed, to put shoes on their children's feet, and real poverty will once again exist in this section of our Nation.

I could speak at great length on this bill, pointing out its advantages. The members of the committee have very clearly described it and I believe that it is clear to us all that the purpose of this legislation is to give some relief to the farmers who need it the most. I do not say that we have entirely cured all the evils under the present administration, for surely under such large and extensive program some people will get hurt. It is inevitable. But I do believe that this is a step in the right direction and should be passed and I urge my fellow Members to join with those of us who are sponsoring this legislation and secure its early enactment.

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 5 minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a question in the minds of many Members of the House what position the Department of Agriculture has taken on this measure. That opinion was inserted in the RECORD on yesterday, I believe, by the chairman of the committee; but for the information of those who might not have read it and do not know the position of the Department, I should like to read a paragraph from a letter dated January 26, 1950, addressed to the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture from the Department of Agriculture. The second paragraph, which is the gist of the entire four-page letter, reads as follows:

On the basis that the reported resolution is an emergency measure for 1 year designed to authorize the correction of certain gross inequities which have resulted from the application of the provisions of Public Laws 272 and 439, Eighty-first Congress, the Department is in favor of its enactment. However, the Department's recommendation is based on an understanding that you intend to reconsider Public Law 272 with the object in mind of rewriting the cotton acreage allotment provision of that law in a manner which will not require similar emergency measures in the future. The history of emergency amendments for correcting inequitable cotton acreage allotments is that the additional acreage allotted is always over and above the amounts considered necessary for proper adjustments of supplies to demand.

As I say, the Department endorses this bill in its present form as emergency legislation. If it is materially amended, I do not know what position the Department might take. Which brings up the question of the amendment offered by the very able and distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN]. I cannot say that I disagree with the objective of his amendment, but I should like to know in the first place about how many more acres will be required if his amendment should be adopted.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WORLEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHITTEN. In answer may I ask the gentleman this: Would the gentleman need to know how many acres it would add to the total acreage before he would vote to deprive a man who had farmed cotton all his life, had nothing else he could do, deprive him of an opportunity to plant any cotton? Would the gentleman need to know how much acreage would be added?

Mr. WORLEY. I would certainly like to know.

Mr. WHITTEN. I am disappointed in the gentleman. I take it from his answer that he means that he would vote to deprive a large segment of the people of the United States in my area of a right to make a living in the only way they know how to make a living unless he knew how much cotton that would be.

Mr. WORLEY. As I said, I think I agree with the objectives of the gentleman's amendment; but the gentleman knows, as a matter of fact, that as responsible officials we are supposed to know what we are doing when we enact legislation.

Mr. WHITTEN. That is right, but may I ask the gentleman——

Mr. WORLEY. If the gentleman will let me proceed, the point I am trying to make is how much study the gentleman has devoted to this proposition. Let me ask the gentleman this: What is a tenant? Is a tenant or share cropper a man who farms 1 acre, 10,000 acres, or how many acres?

Mr. WHITTEN. I do not mean to reflect on the gentleman in the least—and it is a matter of judgment—but I would say that I have devoted fully as much time to working on agricultural problems since I have been in Congress as has the gentleman, if not more.

Mr. WORLEY. I would say the gentleman has devoted more time, and has done an excellent job as chairman of the Appropriation Subcommittee on Agriculture.

Mr. WHITTEN. And I may say further that there is no politics in this, for the folks who are tenant farmers and share croppers and renters do not even vote—that is, most of them do not; and the landowners in many cases are not interested in this type of legislation. But I do not want to walk down the streets of my town and see Tom Jones, Will Brown, or John Smith who has not got a decent home because of a law that we passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WORLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Mississippi this question: If his amendment is adopted what will prevent a landowner from moving more tenants off of the farm in addition to those who are admittedly displaced at the present time? Would this not be an opportunity, a golden opportunity I may say, for a landowner to remove even more tenants and thereby get more acreage for himself? I will be glad to cooperate with my friend in trying to work out a satisfactory solution for this group in the permanent cotton allotment bill.

Mr. WHITTEN. The bill now before us is in charge of the Committee on Agriculture. I started off by saying this amendment would make the bill hard to administer, I still insist that is true, but this bill is under the control of the gentlemen's committee and I dare say they can write around it such restrictions to prevent conniving between landlord and tenant to prevent what the gentleman points out. Let me say if the landlords keep all of the tenants that they have on their land, this amendment will not add 1 acre to the national total. It is only when the landlord puts them off that we give that tenant 5 acres of cotton, which might make 5 bales of cotton that might bring $750, which might give that tenant $370 on which to live for a whole year. That is precious little, and certainly you do not want to deprive him of that.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WORLEY. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. Has the gentleman tried to ascertain from the gentleman from Mississippi what acreage would be added to the cotton program in the event the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi prevails?

Mr. WHITTEN. I say again that if the landlords keep on their farms the tenants they now have or an equal number it will not add 1 acre.

Mr. COOLEY. How much would the gentleman reduce the production of cotton if he is going to keep everybody growing cotton as they are now?

Mr. WHITTEN. I realize we have to have some controls if we are to continue this program, but if we cannot have those two without putting on the public road a big segment of the population in a given area, we will have to find some other way to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, of course we would all like to see everybody keep their job. We would like to see all tenants cared for and given a chance to prosper. But this is a cotton-reduction program which 90 percent of the farmers voted in favor of. It is not what the House of Representatives did but what the cotton-producing farmers voted for themselves.

If this amendment were to prevail I would like to know what would prevent two landowners from swapping tenants and whether or not when the sharecropper or tenant moved over to the other friendly landlord he would bring additional acres in cotton quotas with him? Why, you would have the landowners bidding for tenants who had been given large quotas to come onto their place. Certain tenants would be carrying large cotton allotments in their pockets, which they could sell or deliver to any landlord.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. I wonder if the author of the amendment would be willing to answer the gentleman's question. It is a very pertinent one.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes so that I may answer some of these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTEN. I am sorry to have to ask the gentleman to repeat his question.

Mr. SUTTON. What would prevent two landowners from trading tenants and what could prevent the tenants from bargaining their allotments? What would happen in that event?

Mr. WHITTEN. I pointed out a moment ago that this bill is in the control of the House Committee on Agriculture. Consideration is not yet completed. It is open to amendment. I am sure that in the event this amendment is adopted the gentleman and his committee will devote their attention to preventing such a thing as the gentleman pictures happening. All you have to do is to provide penalties, that they will lose their cotton acreage, or that they shall do certain other things.

Mr. SUTTON. Let me answer the gentleman's question.

We have carefully considered this cotton bill. We wrote it in the Committee on Agriculture. We have had under consideration this very amendment in the Committee on Agriculture. It was proposed to give an allotment to tobacco and wheat and all other commodities, and we found that a program of allotments on commodities produced, would be most inequitable to the landowners in America. We found that the only equitable way we can make allotments is to base them on the land. The Department of Agriculture, and the Members of the House of Representatives who testified before our committee, realize that that is the equitable way. You cannot let a man go around on the streets with an allotment in his pocket, because you would have all of the farmers bidding for him to farm their land, and that is exactly what we are trying to prohibit. The gentleman from Mississippi has studied this legislation and he knows he has the situation down in Mississippi of the tenant farmers and we are in sympathy with him, but at the same time we do not want to see inequities all over the country because of certain isolated cases.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. I would like to emphasize the point that the gentleman has just made, that the amendment now before the House is incompatible with the philosophy of these programs because, as the gentleman has just suggested, when these programs were written years ago consideration was given to the very proposition which has now been proposed, and it was deemed then that it was not feasible, and the allotments are now made to the farm and not to the farmer.

Mr. SUTTON. As it should be.

Mr. COOLEY. And he comes at this late date, because of a peculiar situation in Mississippi, and undertakes to change the basic philosophy of the whole program. I would like to say to the gentleman that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi would wreck this cotton program, and you might as well throw it out of the window.

Mr. SUTTON. You might as well discard the entire farm program relating to cotton, tobacco, and all other crops.

Mr. COOLEY. It would end the cotton program, there is no doubt about that. It would result in an unlimited supply of cotton, as he contemplated.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, I asked for these additional 5 minutes in order that I might explain section 3. It was my amendment that was put in the resolution in the Committee on Agriculture. I offered the amendment because of hardship cases and because of the discrepancies in the BAE figures. I would like to make a statement for the RECORD to show the intent of the author of the amendment and the intent of the Committee on Agriculture so that there will be no misunderstanding by the Department of Agriculture when the Solicitor General interprets the bill. The purpose of section 3 of this bill is, in case any farmer thinks that the BAE figures, or figures that have been given to him by the county committee, are not correct, he will have 15 days after the resolution has been passed, or 15 days after notice has been sent out, to go to the county committee and present his claim that his allotment is wrong. Then after that he has the privilege of going to this reviewing committee, and if he has the proof that he is entitled to more acres than they have given him, then it is the intention of the author of this amendment and of the Committee on Agriculture that the Solicitor General of the Department of Agriculture will so interpret that this reviewing committee must mandatorily give to this farmer that to which he is rightfully entitled. It is not the intention of the author of the amendment, nor the Committee on Agriculture, that the county committee should have to refer to the State committee before the reviewing committee can give the relief due. I hope that the intention of the author and the committee will be carried out by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTTON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTEN. Does not the gentleman admit that under the bill as it was passed before, and as it will be amended in the event the present resolution is adopted, that there will be many farmers who have farmed cotton all their lives, but who do not have the fortune of owning land, who will not have any way in the world of planting cotton?

Mr. SUTTON. To my personal knowledge, I do not know of anybody like that.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, is it not the purpose of this resolution to provide additional acreage not only to those who own and operate the land, but to those landlords who operate their lands by tenants?

Mr. SUTTON. That is definite.

Until we establish as a base 70 percent of what was planted on the average in 1946, 1947, and 1948, landowners are going to suffer the great hardships the gentleman has in mind.

There was a case cited on the floor yesterday by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE]. A lady stated she wanted only 125 acres and she would get 140. She could keep all of her tenants if she could get only 125. I think the gentleman from Mississippi will admit the same thing will apply to Mississippi as has applied to North Carolina.

I trust this amendment is defeated, because we have studied long this problem of giving the allotment to the man and letting him put it in his pocket, and we have decided it is not feasible and will not work. We hope this resolution as it now stands will be adopted by this Congress and by the other body, and that it will go out to alleviate the inequities that now exist.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on pending amendment close in 20 minutes, the last 5 minutes to be reserved to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, of course I am supporting the amendment offered by my colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

You are not controlling cotton acreage in Brazil. Did you know that Brazil can grow more cotton than the United States?

You are not controlling cotton acreage in Argentina. Argentina can grow more cotton than all our Southern States.

You are not controlling the cotton acreage in Mexico, or Guatemala, or Bolivia, or Paraguay, or Chile, or any other of the South or Central American countries.

You are just kidding yourselves. You remind me of the man in Gulliver's Travels who spent his life, almost, trying to learn to extract sunbeams from cucumbers.

In 1920 the rest of the world outside of the United States grew only 8,000,000 bales of cotton. In 1947 they grew 15,000,000 bales.

When you started this regimentation back in 1933 you started a boom in the production of cotton abroad, and that is what you are doing now.

Let me get back to the little cotton farmer. You do not hear any row between the landlord and the tenant where I come from. The majority of the tenants in my county and the counties around me, especially the counties to the east and north of me, are white people. As a rule they are related to the landholder. Many of those little fellows will be driven from the fields unless this amendment is adopted.

The Negro tenants, many of them, will also be driven from the field. Of course, they can go to St. Louis, Detroit, Chicago, New York, or Philadelphia, and probably have a good time; I do not know. But I do know you are driving them from the cotton fields of the South.

We had a war a few years ago. Do you know who sent the largest percentage of their sons to that war of anybody in America? The white cotton farmers of the South. You levied a quota based on population. You took the white boys to do the fighting. You did not allow these little cotton farmers any exemption whatsoever, but you stripped the cotton farms of the white boys of the South, and now deny them the opportunity to work for a living.

A man, in order to have some money to pay his taxes and to buy his clothes and buy sugar and coffee and a few other things, must have something to sell. Yet you want to deny him the right to grow 5 acres of cotton when you know good and well, if this thing passes, there is going to be a boom in cotton production in South America. You are simply taking it away from your own people and you are not guarding against growing it abroad.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. This same cotton that is produced in South America, Brazil, and Argentina, that the gentleman is speaking of, is not under the control of the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly not. That is what I am trying to tell you. You are driving cotton production out of the United States and by this regimentation increasing cotton production everywhere else in the world. I think this amendment should pass. If you do not pass it, you are going to throw thousands of little farmers, who have always been tenants, out of work. Many of them do not want to own land because, to be frank with you, some people would rather rent than try to own land in a great many areas.

So you are driving these people from the farms—the very farms that you stripped of their white boys to get men to do the fighting in the recent war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH].

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, unquestionably the gentleman from Mississippi has touched on one of the most important phases of any control program, be it peanuts, cotton, or any other crop. The question is whether or not you are going to be fair with all, with everybody concerned—whether or not you are going to write a live and let live program. I submit that too often that kind of program has not been written. A good many of you read the Wall Street Journal. Here is an issue of the Wall Street Journal dated January 12. The headline says, "Rural unemployment—Controlling the peanut surplus creates big farm labor surplus—cuts in acreage forces out share-croppers and hired hands—Hits small town business."

That refers to peanuts. I do not think any of you would believe that Georgia is the hardest hit State so far as peanuts are concerned. We have in our section of Texas a group of people who, in my opinion, are hit much harder than those in Georgia with reference to peanuts, Oklahoma was hit hard. This story about wrecking the program is as old as the program itself. Every time a Member brings in an amendment undertaking to help the smaller fellow, as in the instance of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN], it is alleged that the program will be wrecked. I say that if the program will wreck the homes of the kind of people the gentleman from Missisippi [Mr. WHITTEN] is talking about, you had better amend and change the program so that the homes of these people and the economic status of these people will not be wrecked—certainly until something else is available by which they can earn a living. Let us see what some of the farmers in Georgia might be saying about the current situation. I read from the Wall Street Journal again:

> Some farmers forced to fire families who have lived for years on their land are beginning to wonder about the system, however. Planter W. C. Adams comments: "I do not know how far the farmer can continue in this direction. One of these days he will come to the end of the row and balk like a Georgia mule."

I say to you that those of you who are truly interested in preserving the farm program—those of you who want to keep agriculture on a stable basis certainly should be interested in taking care of the kind of problem referred to by Mr. Whitten. I mentioned the county of Harrison yesterday where the PMA said in a letter to me that they will lose some 300 or 400 farmers. And they are not all tenant farmers I would say. Some of these people are farmers who bought little places expecting some security from those farms only to find out today that they have no peanut allotment or have no cotton allotment or if they have, that it is only nine-tenths of an acre or one acre or some such number or fraction of an acre, which is meaningless.

Mr. Chairman, I enclose some communications about peanuts:

[From the Wall Street Journal of January 12, 1950]

RURAL UNEMPLOYMENT—CONTROLLING THE PEANUT SURPLUS CREATES A BIG FARM LABOR SURPLUS—CUTS IN ACREAGE FORCE OUT SHARECROPPER, HIRED HAND—HIT SMALL-TOWN BUSINESS—HAPPENING IN COTTON, TOO

(By James Flowers)

CAMILLA, GA.—Government acreage cutbacks are slashing crop surpluses—and creating a surplus of farm labor.

Here in the heart of peanutland you'll notice today that many a tenant farmer's house is standing vacant. In many another you'll still find the farmer's wife, and usually a swarm of children, but pappy is in town, looking for a job. He won't find one.

"This farm situation down here is going to leave not hundreds but thousands of people with nothing to do and no place to go," says Fred Hand, a planter who happens also to be speaker of the Georgia House of Representatives. "I had five tenant families on my farm last year. This year I will need only two. My peanut allotment has been cut from 528 acres to 278 acres in 2 years."

This rural unemployment is a byproduct of planning in Washington for the general welfare. The victims are Americans whom the planners would have probably labeled "underprivileged" even before they were thrown out of work—hired hands and sharecroppers mostly Negroes. They don't even get unemployment compensation.

The Agriculture Department decreed an average 22-percent reduction in all United States land sown to peanuts in 1949. For 1950 it has ordered a further 20-percent average slash from the planting permitted last year. Here in the Georgia-Florida-Alabama area which grows more than half the Nation's peanuts, these restrictions are giving a shock to the whole rural economy. Peanuts are only half of the story; cotton is being cut back, too. Tenants who have no work can't spend money in the small towns.

"Unemployment will certainly affect my ice and cold-storage business," says E. L. Butler, of Camilla. "I don't know how long we could stand a mass exodus of surplus labor. It may make ghost towns of the small communities of the South." The owner of a department store in near Pelham reports that a good number of his customers are failing to pay their bills when they come due, for the first time in years.

The migration from the farms is moving slowly because most displaced men have no clear idea of where they and their families can go. Sharecropper Willie J. Clark has moved to town and is looking for a job. If he doesn't strike any better luck than he has had so far, he says, he will head north "quick as the sap begins runnin'."

"Sho' don't know, sho' don't," says cropper Buddie Lee, asked about his plans. He complains that he was just beginning to make enough money to buy plenty of corn pone, black-eyed peas, and sowbelly for his young 'uns when he got "whacked back to nuthin'."

"Farm hands—young and old, black and white—come by our crushing plant every day or so looking for work," says T. B. Twitty, Jr., vice president of the Camilla Cotton Oil Co. "Wish we could help, but we just don't need any more labor."

THE PEANUT PLAN

Why have things been planned this way? Nobody in Washington, of course, had unemployment as his objective. The whole idea was to benefit the farmers.

Back in the 1930's goobers sold for as low as $20 a ton. But Congress, deciding that the nuts were one of the Nation's basic crops, legislated wartime and then postwar price support which today holds prices at about $210 a ton.

This has proved quite a production incentive. Output jumped from 1,395,000,000 pounds a year in the 1937–41 period to 2,388,000,000 in 1942–48, which closed the era of unrestricted planting. For a while the market could absorb this mammoth increase. Peanut butter was a substitute for meat on American tables when the latter was scarce, and foreigners were eager for proteins and oils at war's end. Exports boomed from just 1,000,000 pounds a year in 1937–41 to 763,000,000 pounds in 1948. Then came deflation of this market; latest statistics show only a sixth as many were exported during the third quarter last year as in the similar period the previous year.

Surpluses had begun to be troublesome even in 1948; the Government lost about $25,000,000 supporting prices. It came off no better on the 1949 crop despite the acreage cutback last year; more than a quarter million tons had to be purchased by the Commodity Credit Corporation to prop prices.

The coming crisis was visible even in 1947; on a December day the Nation's peanut planters voted overwhelmingly in favor of granting the Agriculture Department authority to restrict their plantings. Last year the power was first used, and the crop was held to 1,853,000,000 pounds.

Because of convolutions in the law, the restrictions hit some peanut planters a lot harder than others. The 1950 reductions from 1949 acreage require that Louisiana farmers must choke their peanut acreage an average 38 percent, while those in Arizona are actually permitted a 139-percent increase. Even those in this region find their luck varies considerably; Georgia's cut is 20.1 percent; neighboring Florida is forced back only 12.7 percent; Alabama suffers a stiff 31.2 percent reduction.

The planters don't relish the curtailments, but few of them regret they have permitted it.

"Sure, I voted for crop control," says Drewry Ledbetter. "What else could you do? I remember the depression years." Like other planters, he is trying to soften the impact on his labor force. "I'm going to try and carry my tenants as long as possible, even though I only have enough work for half of them," he declares.

Some planters, forced to fire families who have lived for years on their land, are beginning to wonder about the system, however. Planter W. C. Adams comments: "I don't know how far the farmer can continue in this direction. One of these days he will come to the end of the row and balk like a Georgia mule."

Farm owners are attempting to shift to other kinds of agriculture, but these don't demand much labor.

"Most of the large planters will turn their lost peanut acreage into pasture and either increase their beef herd or try and get one started," says farm agent J. A. Mauldin. "The little operator doesn't have the acreage nor the money to do this so he'll try to truck farm a little with an extra patch of vegetables or maybe get a brood sow and try raising more hogs, since you can grow all the peanuts you want for feed. Then, too, a corn crop will be good for feed, roasting ears, and the market."

Says W. J. Sullivan, one of the largest planters in this area: "I had 35 cropper families on the place last year, but with my reduced allotment this year I had to let 10 families go. As for a new money crop, I already have about 140 head of cattle but cows are so high now I'm not going to venture any further. I plan to let a lot of my land lay idle."

Small operator Robert Shiver, who has let two of his three cropper families go, says, "I can't jump into cattle raising because it will take a heap of money. I'm going to try and grow into it though."

Bank president and planter E. J. Vann, Jr., says restrictions will be a death blow to many small farm owners, as well as to hired hands.

"Some land in this area will sell that ordinarily wouldn't, just because of these crop cutbacks," says Mr. Vann. "The really small operator who owns his farm may be forced to sell because he won't get enough acreage allotments to operate profitably."

Laments one small farmer whose allotment allowed him only 16 acres of peanuts for 1950: "I can't make it on that, and don't intend to try."

WHAT'S AHEAD FOR 1950?

Peanuts: Price support for the 1950 crop will be down by only about half a cent a pound on the average—to about 10 cents. The minimum national acreage allotment for the 1950 crop is 2,100,000 acres. This allotment would reduce the picked and threshed acreage about a fourth from 1949. It indicates a crop this year of roughly 1,500,000,000 pounds, compared with 1,800,000,000 pounds last year and more than 2,000,000,000 in every year from 1942 through 1948.

Soybeans: With production of cottonseed, flaxseed, and peanuts being reduced, a large acreage of soybeans will be needed to supply protein meal for livestock. Prices will hold close to 1949 levels. Price support for soybeans raised in 1950 will be only a little lower than for 1949.

Something like the above makes us feel that we should be permitted to grow peanuts for oil if wanted by farmers. Soybeans are supported and acreage not controlled.

Freight on the soybean meal to the Southwest will run about $20 per ton and peanut oil is far superior to other oils.

THE CAIN BANKING CO., INC.,
Winnsboro, Tex., January 26, 1950.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT AGENCY,
Quitman, Tex.

GENTLEMEN: It is indeed very seldom that I am so aroused to the extent that I write a letter of this sort, but from actual facts that have come to my attention in the past weeks, I cannot but write and express my personal views concerning this new agricultural allotment program.

Let me give you a concrete example of the situation as it exists in Wood County: Yesterday a man came into my office, who started farming last year, and will, in all probability, need assistance in making a crop this year. He is a good man, and has a good credit rating with us. Yet this man is allowed no cotton allotment, and no peanut allotment on his place for the year 1950.

As a banker, I feel that it is my duty to the community to make funds available to good farmers on a sound, conservative basis. My question, then, is this: How can I help the community and how can I help the farmers when in the beginning I know that it is impossible to hope for any repayment of a loan on such conditions? My second question is this: Is the Government lending agency going to take care of farmers who are burdened by this limited acreage allotment? My third question is this: How is one of our east Texas farmers going to produce, and how is he going to live?

I am aware of the fact that this letter will in all probability create no adjustment of the many inequalities; yet, I urge you to consider it, and if necessary, forward it to the persons who control and promulgate your rules. I want my protest to be recorded.

Yours very truly,

MALVIN CAIN.

NOVEMBER 17, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of October 2 requesting that we furnish you an example illustrating the dollars and cents cost to a producer who picks or threshes 11 acres of peanuts from a farm which has a 10-acre allotment for 1949.

Under the 1949 marketing quota regulations the penalty, in accordance with section 359 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, is collected upon a portion of each lot of peanuts marketed from the farm equal to the proportion which the acreage of peanuts in excess of the allotment is of the total acreage of peanuts on the farm. In administering this provision, a "percent excess" is determined and multiplied by the basic penalty rate to arrive at the "converted penalty rate" for the farm. This converted penalty rate is multiplied by the number of pounds in each lot which the producer sells to determine the amount of penalty.

The following example illustrates the method of determining the amount of the marketing quota penalty, assuming a yield of 500 pounds per acre (the approximate average yield per acre in your district):

EXAMPLE

1. 1949 allotment, 10 acres.
2. 1949 peanut acreage, 11 acres.
3. Excess acreage (item 2 minus item 1), 1 acre.
4. Percentage excess (item 3 divided by item 2) equals 9.1 percent.
5. Basic penalty rate (one-half of support price) equals 5.3 cents per pound.
6. Converted penalty rate (item 5 multiplied by item 4) equals 0.4 cent per pound.
7. Total production (assuming yield of 500 pounds per acre) (500 multiplied by 11) equals 5,500 pounds.
8. Total penalty to be paid (item 7 multiplied by item 6) equals $22.

However, it is equally important to point out that in addition to the marketing-quota penalty, none of the peanuts produced on the farm would be eligible for price support at 90 percent of parity. Instead of being assured of a price at not less than 90 percent of parity, the producer would have to offer his peanuts on the open market at whatever price buyers were willing to pay. The only guaranty that he would have under the price-support program would be that receiving agencies would purchase his excess peanuts only (the 500 pounds produced on the 1 acre excess) at the relatively low level of 54 percent of parity.

We regret that through error in our letter of August 23 we stated that excess peanuts were eligible for price support at 60 percent of parity. The law provides that the support price for excess peanuts shall be 60 percent of the full support price, which is equivalent to 54 percent of parity.

Sincerely yours,

K. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your notation written on Mr. Hutchinson's letter to you dated November 17, 1949, regarding the marketing quota penalty on excess peanuts.

Following is the example you requested:

1. 1949 allotment, 2 acres.
2. 1949 peanut acreage, 11 acres.
3. Excess acreage (item 2 minus item 1), 9 acres.
4. Percent excess (item 3 divided by item 2) equals 81.8.
5. Basic penalty rate (one-half of support price) equals 5.3 cents per pound.
6. Converted penalty rate (item 5 multiplied by item 4) equals 4.3.
7. Total production (assuming 500-pound yield) equals 5,500 pounds.
8. Total penalty to be paid (item 7 multiplied by item 6) equals $236.50.

Sincerely,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Secretary.

HALLETTSVILLE, TEX., January 14, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR SIR: We note through the papers that the peanut acreage for 1950 has been greatly reduced again; this is going to work an awful hardship on the small peanut grower, due to the fact that the cut last year in this county cut quite a few of the growers to such small acreage.

We think that it should be so provided that there be a small minimum number of acres per farm, possibly 6 or 7 acres, and also in each county where the allowable peanut acreage to the farmer is so small that he does not use the allotment it could be transferable to other farmer or grower that was planting his small allotment.

We think such a policy would keep many little peanut growers carrying this as one of their projects to help them make their living and have a balanced all-around farm income for the whole year.

We believe that this provision should be written into the law, and to insure its passage we think petitions should be addressed to the Congressman of each district by the growers located therein.

We submit this for your consideration.

Yours truly,

O. B. SOKOL.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., January 25, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of January 20 with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. O. B. Sokol, of Halletsville, Tex. Mr. Sokol made a number of suggestions regarding farm peanut acreage allotments.

It is true that the 1950 farm peanut-acreage allotments will be considerably smaller than 1949 allotments for the reason that the State allotment is about 29 percent smaller than the 1949 State allotment. The smaller farm allotments will, undoubtedly, make it difficult for some peanut farmers to continue to produce the crop. I have no suggestions to make as to provisions for release and reapportionment of peanut allotments and minimum farm peanut allotments. These two provisions are not included in current legislation for peanut acreage allotments and marketing quotas. Such authority would need to be given by the Congress in the form of amendatory legislation.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of October 14 requesting information as to the base periods used for marketing-quota purposes for peanuts, wheat, and cotton, and an explanation of any differences in the base periods used for these commodities.

In the case of peanuts, the national marketing quota and acreage allotment is established pursuant to section 358 (a) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, which prescribes a base period of the 5 years preceding the year in which the marketing quota is proclaimed and the national acreage allotment established. For example, the 1950 marketing quota, which must be proclaimed by December 1, 1949, will be determined on the basis of the average quantity of peanuts harvested for nuts during the period 1944 to 1948, inclusive, adjusted for current trends and prospective demand conditions. The national marketing quota for 1950 will be converted to a national acreage allotment on the basis of the average yield per acre of peanuts in the 5 years 1944 to 1948, inclusive, with such adjustments as may be found necessary to correct for trends in yields and abnormal conditions of production affecting yields in such 5 years. (Due to the provisions of Public Law 272, 81st Cong., approved August 29, 1949, the 1950 national acreage allotment cannot be less than 2,100,000 acres.)

The national peanut-acreage allotment is apportioned to the peanut-producing States, pursuant to section 358 (c) of the act. This section provides for the use of a base period of the 5 years preceding the year in which the national allotment is determined. Therefore, the base period that would be used for 1950 would be the 5 years 1944 to 1948, inclusive.

The State acreage allotments are apportioned among farms in accordance with section 358 (d) of the act. The law does not prescribe a specific base period for use in determining farm-acreage allotments but provides generally that farm allotments will be based on the tillable acreage available for the production of peanuts and the past acreage of peanuts on the farm, taking into consideration the peanut acreage allotments established for the farm under previous agricultural adjustment and conservation programs. Regulations governing the establishing of 1950 farm peanut acreage allotments have not yet been approved. The regulations governing the establishment of 1949 farm peanut allotments provided for the use of a 3-year base period, 1946–48, inclusive. At the time these regulations were developed considerable thought was given to the advisability of using a 5-year base period rather than a 3-year base. It was decided that the use of the 3-year base period would be better from the standpoint of determining fair and equitable allotments. This decision was based primarily on the fact that accurate measurements of farm peanut acreages were not available for the years 1943–47, inclusive, and it would be difficult to obtain accurate reports from farmers for 4 or 5 years prior to the time the allotments were established.

The national wheat-acreage allotment is apportioned among States on the basis of the acreage seeded for production of wheat during the preceding 10 calendar years, with adjustments for abnormal weather and trends in acreage during such periods. The State acreage allotment is apportioned among counties in the State on the basis of the acreage seeded for production of wheat during the preceding 10 calendar years, with adjustments for abnormal weather and trends in acreage during such period and for the promotion of soil-conservation practices, and the county acreage allotment is apportioned among farms in the county on the basis of tillable acres, crop-rotation practices, type of soil, and topography, as indicated by the planting of wheat.

In the case of cotton the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, including amendments made by Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, and the Agricultural Act of 1949, provides that the national acreage allotment for 1950 shall be not less than 21,000,000 acres. The act further provides that the national acreage allotment shall be distributed to the States on the basis of each State's share of a national allotment base of 22,500,000 acres computed and adjusted by the following steps:

(a) Calculate for each State the average acreage planted (or regarded as planted in 1945, 1946, or 1947 under Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) to cotton in the 4 years 1945–48, except that the average of the 5 years 1944–48 is to be used for any State which planted in 1948 more than 1,000,000 acres, but less than one-half its 1943 allotment.

(b) Add to the average acreage computed for each State under step (a) the estimated additional acreage required for increasing allotments for small farms to the smaller of 5 acres or the highest number of acres planted (or regarded as planted in 1946 or 1947 under Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) to cotton in 1946, 1947, or 1948.

(c) If, after steps (a) and (b) are taken, the acreage base for any State is less than the larger of 95 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton in 1947 and 1948 or 85 percent of the acreage planted to cotton in 1948, the State base computed under steps (a) and (b) must be adjusted upward so as to give the State such minimum acreage base.

(d) If the total of the acreage bases for all States determined under steps (a), (b), and (c) is more or less than 22,500,000 acres, an adjustment would be made on a pro rata basis for each State not receiving an adjustment under step (c) so as to provide a total national base of 22,500,000 acres.

The acreage allotments established for counties, less a reserve not to exceed 15 percent of the county allotment, would be apportioned to farms on which cotton was planted (or regarded as planted in 1946 or 1947 under Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) during one or more of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948 on the following basis:

(1) There will be allotted to each such farm the smaller of (a) 5 acres, or (b) the highest number of acres planted (or regarded as planted in 1946 or 1947 under Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) in any of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948.

(2) The remainder of the county acreage allotments will be apportioned to farms, other than those receiving an allotment under (1) (b) above, on the basis of a uniform prescribed percentage of cropland on each farm, excluding the acreage devoted to certain other crops specified in the act and nonirrigated lands in irrigated areas. No farm, however, will receive an allotment under this provision which will be in excess of the highest acreage planted (or regarded as planted under Public Law 12, 79th Cong., in 1946 or 1947) to cotton on the farm during any of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948.

The county reserve is to be used by the county committee for adjustments in allotments which are found to be out of line with allotments for other farms, taking into account land, labor, and equipment available for the production of cotton, crop-rotation practices, the soil, and other physical facilities affecting the production of cotton and abnormal conditions of production on such farms; and for establishing allotments for those farms on which cotton was not planted (or not regarded as planted in 1946 or 1947 under Public Law 12, 79th Cong.) in 1946, 1947, or 1948 on the basis of land, labor, and equipment available for the production of cotton, crop-rotation practices, the soil, and other physical facilities affecting the production of cotton. In counties where farm allotments of 5 to 15 acres are determined in (1) and (2) above, the act directs the county committee to set aside not less than 20 percent of the county reserve, if needed, to provide fair and reasonable allotments for such farms.

In view of the above provisions of the act, State and county committees are provided considerable latitude for establishing fair and equitable allotments for counties and farms.

The provisions with respect to the apportionment of allotments for different crops have been developed over a period of years by congressional action after extensive public hearings and recommendations from various groups. Presumably differences in the areas where the various crops are grown, conditions under which they are grown, and many other related factors influenced the congressional action that established the legislation which provides for different base periods to be used in establishing the allotments for different commodities.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON].

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Chairman, it is to be regretted that the pending House Joint Resolution 398 has provoked so much controversy and that the passing of this vital resolution has been unnecessarily delayed. Of course, our friends from the North who are espousing the cause of Fair Employment Practice Commission are entirely within their rights in using every delaying action possible. Surely there can be no comparison in the importance of the enactment of some sort of remedial crop legislation and the proposed enactment of such a visionary scheme as that embodied in the proposed Fair Employment Practice Act.

Personally, I am keenly interested in any measure pertaining to agriculture. My district traditionally is an agricultural as well as a great industrial district. In observing the correspondence and from conversations with my colleagues, it is apparent that those of my district are not as disturbed about the pending situation as they are in other sections of the country. The fact that I have received very little complaint does not mean that there may not be those who will suffer under the Agricultural Adjustment Act as amended in the last session of Congress or at least through the interpretation of said act by the Department.

It is natural that we have our varied views about what is best to do under the circumstances. Manifestly, something along the line of the provisions contained in the pending resolution should be adopted, and that without delay. Dealing with crop quotas is an involved subject. It would be humanly impossible to write a law which would please everyone. We simply must keep our cotton surplus down as low as possible. We must not drive bona fide farmers from the farm to further complicate unemployment in our cities and more congested areas. During the consideration of this measure I have voted for several of the amendments proposed thereto with the hope of perfecting and providing the very best possible remedy under the law.

Let us get on with the business at hand and pass this resolution, making it clear that it is the duty of the Congress to write the law and that the administrative departments should diligently seek to carry out the expressed wishes of the lawmaking body.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] is recognized.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, of course the committee recognizes that there is a human problem, not only in marketing quotas but in nearly every activity in life. We even considered in committee the advisability, in making allotments, of taking into account the number of people in the family. I am sure I could present a forceful argument that a man with 8 or 10 children should have a larger cotton allotment than a man with no children or with 1 child. The only thing about it is that in the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] we have already, as best we could, taken care of exactly the situation he mentions. We provide for new farm allotments under the legislation. The State of Mississippi, a great cotton State, receives an allotment of 2,295,000 acres, which is not too much for the State. Under the law, the State committee of Mississippi, that is the State PMA committee of three or five men, could have reserved 10 percent of that 2,300,000 acres for new farmers.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I am sorry; I cannot yield right now.

The State committee of Mississippi could have reserved 230,000 acres to do this job, if they had wanted to. More than that, every county in the State of Mississippi could have reserved 15 percent to do this very job for new farmers. I mean to say that under the law, in the great State of Mississippi, and my State the same way, they could have reserved over 500,000 acres of cotton land to take care of this situation, if they thought it was entitled to that much consideration. Instead of reserving 500,000 acres, how much did Mississippians themselves reserve? They reserved only 25,000 acres to take care of all new-farm allotments.

Now, you work your own will here. That is all I want to say about this amendment. I do not know whether it is wise to throw this temptation in men's faces or not. The gentleman's amendment says only one thing: "If a tenant is put off of a cotton farm without his being at fault—

All right, let us take JOE BRYSON and myself. You cut me to 70 percent. All in the world I have to do to my tenants is to go to them and say, "They have cut me to 70 percent. I want all of that myself. You will have to get off."

Under this amendment, they can go to JOE BRYSON'S farm and get some more cotton land. Joe says to his tenants, "You get off. I need what I have. You go to PACE'S farm and get some land and an allotment of your own."

All we would have to do would be to change tenants, and it would not be any 50 or 70 percent that we would get. It could be two or three hundred percent, as much cotton as was planted in the base years.

The question is, Do we want to adopt an amendment here that will put in front of every cotton farmer in the United States the temptation that "all I have to do is to run my tenants off and go and get some tenants from another farm, who have been growing cotton, and then each of them will get an additional cotton allotment to grow cotton on my farm"? In my judgment, no man alive can make an estimate of what this amendment will add. I will say it adds somewhere between 100,000 and 5,000,000 acres of cotton land. In fact, it could almost completely double the national allotment. There is no Member of this House for whose ability and integrity I have greater respect than I have for the gentleman from Mississippi. I admire him very highly, but he should not come here and throw this thing at us and say, "The responsibility now is yours to work it out." I cannot work it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time on the amendment has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WHITTEN) there were—ayes 8, noes 38.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, for 1950, the State committee may apportion to the county committees in counties or administrative areas with a final allotment factor of less than 35 percent, not more than 50 percent of the State reserve so as to establish farm allotments which are fair and reasonable in relation to the past acreage planted to cotton or regarded as planted to cotton under Public Law 12, Seventy-ninth Congress, on the farm.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to this request, but I hope no other similar requests will be made, for we are anxious to conclude action on the pending resolution.

Mr. GAVIN. I remind the gentleman from North Carolina that I have already spoken to the gentleman and requested his permission to speak out of order.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made such a request.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to these two requests, but I shall hereafter object to anyone's speaking out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New York asks unanimous consent to speak out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time because I wish to answer publicly a letter which I received from one of our colleagues. I had hoped he would be on the floor, but as he gives me the deadline of Wednesday, February 1, to answer his letter, I am obliged to speak today.

My colleague has worked very long and very diligently for passage of H. R. 4453 which I understand he has introduced and reintroduced many times. I have the utmost sympathy with his efforts and objectives. I believe in FEPC. All my people know my stand. I believe it conforms to the Constitution of the United States. It has been put into effect in New York State under the governorship of Thomas E. Dewey and a Republican-controlled legislature and has worked, so far as I know, as satisfactorily as any legislation can work that is humanly conceived.

However, I object to the rather threatening tone of my colleague's letter and am sorry to see he finds it necessary to adopt such language. The last sentence of his letter reads:

Failure to reply to this letter will indicate that you are opposed to FEPC. I will so note on the floor of the House next week.

I have signed petitions in the past and expect to do so in the future. I will never sign because I have been threatened. I am answerable only to the people of my district and I have always kept them fully informed on my votes and positions on all legislation before this House.

I have the utmost sympathy for anyone who feels that he is discriminated against. My distinguished colleague said recently on the floor of this House that he could not aspire to become governor of his and my great State.

I, too, am discriminated against in a like manner. On account of my sex I have gone as far as I can go, politically. I, too, cannot aspire to become governor of the great State of New York. That is no reason for bitterness or threats. I would like to give one piece of advice to all of my colleagues. That is, that you catch more flies with sugar than with vinegar.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, to revise and extend my remarks, to speak out of order, and that my remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GAVIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot continue along the line of levity with which the gentleman who just preceded me indulged. But I have an announcement to make which I believe is of interest to every Member of the House.

President Truman has just made a public announcement that he has ordered the Atomic Energy Commission to proceed in the research and development of the so-called hydrogen bomb, the superbomb which you have read so much about in the paper. This decision, of course, had to be made by the Commander in Chief of the United States as to direction. It is a decision which is fraught with the most terrible portent for the human race. In my opinion, unless an equally challenging statement is made at this time to the people of the world to obtain international control of this weapon, which is estimated to be from 10 to 1,000 times greater than the A-bomb in destructive capacity, then it will make little difference as to the cotton-acreage allotment that we are so concerned with today in this House.

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REGAN: Insert the following new section 5 after section 4 and renumber succeeding sections:

"SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, the cotton-acreage allotment of any new 1949 cotton farm which was completed for planting prior to March 29, 1949, by clearing, plowing, and cultivating the land and was planted to cotton for the first time in 1949, and which was not planted to any crop prior to 1949, shall be not less than 30 percent of the acreage on such farm which was planted to cotton in 1949."

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment does not ask for 70 percent or 60 percent or 40 percent, but it has for its purpose taking care of some pioneer farmers throughout our western part of the country who last year, with full confidence in our Government that we would continue in the farming program, put land in cultivation for the first time. They find this year that they are going to be limited to 9 percent of the acreage that they put in cultivation for the first time last year which was planted to cotton.

It so happens that this land is peculiarly adapted to the growing of cotton, and it is not adapted for growing other crops. They find that when a man put in 100 acres of land last year into cotton for the first time that as the amendment read when it was plowed, cleared, and cultivated for any crop. They put in 100 acres, and this year get about 9. That would not give them enough income to pay the interest on their debts and to make a living on their 100 acres of land. This amendment would permit those farmers to put in as much as 30 percent of their land that they put in cultivation for the first time last year into cotton. It does not mean a great deal in the national set-up in the cotton acreage program. I have discussed this with the members of the committee. It has been discussed thoroughly with the Department of Agriculture by those interested. I am sure they are all in sympathy with the program. It is not going to make a vital difference in the total set-up of the United States, but it does assume a great importance to those few farmers who are coming under this provision of this amendment.

I might add that this is not confined to a selfish interest of my district or State alone, but it would have an effect on six of the States of the West—California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Missouri, and Oklahoma. All have some acreage that would come under the provisions of this amendment. It is a small request to make. I hope the Members of the House will give it unanimous support.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman certainly has a justifiable amendment, in my opinion. I venture to say there is no section of the country where cotton is grown that is harder hit than the areas to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. REGAN. I thank the gentleman from Texas. He is eminently correct.

I might add that a good percentage of the farmers affected adversely under the present law and who will be benefited by this amendment are veterans. The present bill, which I expect to support, does not, however, give them any relief. I think the committee regrets that it was not so provided in the original drafting of the bill.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FISHER. I shall support the gentleman's amendment. The gentleman says the increase is comparatively trivial, but can he indicate the approximate amount of increased acreage that would result?

Mr. REGAN. I could fairly say, but my colleague from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], has secured a lot of figures on that, and I believe he will follow me with a brief discussion of this amendment. I will leave the figures to him, because he has the latest reports.

Mr. FISHER. I understood it was comparatively little.

Mr. REGAN. The gentleman is correct.

I hope that when the time to vote comes the Members will give this amendment their full support, because it certainly is a meritorious one, and I am sure the committee and the Department of Agriculture so consider it.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and rise in support of the amendment, and ask unanimous consent that my remarks follow those of my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN].

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Chairman, I know that the Members of the House are tired. I know you have been discussing cotton for 2 days and have turned down, without exception, every amendment which has been proposed. But I want to tell you now we have one more amendment, an amendment I feel is a just and honest amendment, an amendment that is being proposed to you today which has a definite price tag on it. It is not going to say to us that we will plant hundreds and hundreds of thousands of acres of cotton, but a figure from the Department of Agriculture which will tell us how much cotton will be planted. We have a situation here of men coming back from the services in 1946 and probably taking a year to decide what they were going to do and then borrowing the money and buying their farms. In many cases their first crop came in 1949. They found the old cotton farms were too high in value and they had to go out and buy brushland. After clearing it, at great expense to themselves, they planted their cotton. In my section of the country, in the Rio Grande Valley, they planted it before the law was ever passed, excluding 1949 from future quotas. Now, they find they have a quota of 8, 9, and 10 percent, a quota that they cannot live under. We are asking by this amendment that they be given a quota of 30 percent, not as much as the old farmer, no, because that does not seem to be the intent of the Congress, but enough for them to live on, to meet their mortgages and pay their debts. When we talk about these farmers voting for future legislation on cotton supports, these farmers who planted in 1949 did not get to vote on the future cotton support legislation. The figure I have received from the Department of Agriculture as to how many acres will be covered by this amendment is a total of 84,768 acres of cotton that will be planted by this amendment. I tell you that is not the full total, because those 1949 planters that will get a 1950 quota have a quota now of 8 or 10 percent. When you deduct that from that figure, you have a net increase in acreage, by this amendment, of approximately 55,000 acres. Fifty-five thousand acres to save some farmers from financial ruin.

I believe the House should support this amendment. I think it is a fair and honest amendment.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENTSEN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. I want to say to the gentleman that all the way through the deliberations of the Committee on Agriculture I have consistently fought against eliminating 1949 from consideration in cotton quotas. I think the gentleman's amendment is entirely justified, and I hope the House will support it.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the gentleman very much.

Further, I would like to say it will be said that this amendment does not solve all of the inequities. That is true. There are people who did not plant cotton before 1949, but planted other crops. We did not put that in the amendment because I do not know how much acreage it would take. We have tried to give you a sound amendment that would save as many people as possible from economic bankruptcy. I say that the question of inequity is not as bad on those people as it is on those who planted for the first time in 1949, who cleared and planted their lands, because those lands which had crops prior to 1949 obviously could grow other crops and could do it economically or else they would have planted cotton prior to that time. But these soils are soils that have a high salinity content. Most of those lands can grow economically no other crop than cotton. So if you refuse them an equitable quota, a quota under which they can live, you condemn many of those men to economic bankruptcy.

I do not wave the flag just for the veterans today, because there are other farmers who are included, but I want to help those men, many of them who fought for their country and who were not home and who did not arrive home soon enough to establish a historic quota. I want to see them get a decent quota in 1950. I ask you to give them a quota that they can live under. I ask you to support a fair and honest amendment, an amendment that has a definite estimate by the Department of Agriculture of the amount of acreage that it will take.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENTSEN. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of California. A representative of the Veterans of Foreign Wars appeared before the Committee on Agriculture in support of the very type of legislation that the gentleman is asking for.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank you. I have also been solicited by many members of the veterans' organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] has expired.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman. The persistent, able, patriotic, and fearless efforts of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, and the work of J. Edgar Hoover and his FBI forces, the ablest fact-finding organization in the world, brought to light the treasonable acts of Alger Hiss in stealing from the secret files of the State Department and turning them over to a Russian spy ring. There would have been no exposure of Hiss and he would not have been indicted, tried, and convicted for perjury in denying his treasonable conduct but for the work of the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the FBI. After 21 hours' deliberation, the jury composed of eight women and four men, all good and lawful citizens, convicted Alger Hiss of perjury on each of the 2 counts in the indictment on which he was tried, and on Wednesday, January 25, the judge before whom he was tried, Judge Henry W. Goddard, sentenced him to 5 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Six hours later Hiss, the former adviser of President Roosevelt, and intimate friend and long-time associate of Secretary of State Acheson, was defended and pronounced innocent by Acheson.

This unprecedented action on the part of the Secretary of State in proclaiming his friendship for and his confidence in Hiss brought widespread demands that a congressional investigation be made to determine if the Hiss influence still lives in the State Department.

It can safely be said that it does yet live in the State Department, because Dean Acheson is the head and front of that Department, and if ever there existed on this earth two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one, if there is to be found anywhere in the world two of a kind, two birds of a feather, two intellectual, moral, political twins, we have them in the persons of Dean Acheson, our Secretary of State, and his friend, Alger Hiss.

Out of Acheson's own mouth and by his own words, we are driven to these conclusions.

When Dean Acheson's appointment as Secretary of State was being considered by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Acheson, although Hiss had then been exposed and indicted for the charge on which he was convicted, testified with reference to his friendship for Hiss that he, Acheson, did not "lightly give his friendship and did not lightly withdraw it."

Acheson's statement that despite the conviction of Hiss he would not turn his back on him which was termed "fantastic" in Senate debate, was uttered by him at his press conference in emotional tones. Here is what he said:

I should like to make it clear to you that whatever the outcome of any appeal which Mr. Hiss or his lawyers may take in this case, I do not intend to turn my back on Alger Hiss.

By these words Dean Acheson served notice on the American people and on the United States Court of Appeals to which the Hiss case will go from the district court in New York, and upon the Supreme Court of the United States that he, Acheson, will utterly disregard the findings and opinions of these courts as he flouts the verdict of the jury and the action of Judge Goddard in approving the jury's verdict, and in sentencing Hiss to the penitentiary for 5 years.

Acheson did not stop with his own approval of Hiss but undertook to justify the action of Hiss in betraying his country and in perjuring his soul and blistering his lips with a lie by quoting the words of the Saviour.

Acheson did this immediately after Judge Goddard declared that the penalty which he inflicted on Hiss, and I quote, "should be a warning to all that a crime of this character may not be committed with impunity." Every lawyer knows that when Hiss was found guilty by the jury, and the verdict was approved by Judge Goddard, the presumption of the innocence of Hiss disappeared and that his guilt was established.

Acheson stated that regardless of the fact that all the courts might hold Hiss guilty, he, Acheson, "would not turn his back on Hiss." Acheson then further said, and I quote:

I think every person who has known Alger Hiss or has served with him at any time has upon his conscience the very serious task of deciding what his attitude is and what his conduct should be. That must be done by each person in the light of his own standards and his own principles. For me, there is very little doubt about those standards or those principles. I think they were stated for us a very long time ago. They were stated on the Mount of Olives and if you are interested in seeing them, you will find them in the twenty-fifth chapter of the Gospel according to St. Matthew beginning at verse 34.

Evidently Acheson, in refering to the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew, beginning with verse 34, had in mind the words of Jesus on the last judgment:

34. Then shall the King say unto them on his right, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundations of the world:

35. For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger and ye took me in:

36. Naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

37. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying Lord, when saw we Thee an hungered, and fed Thee; or thirsty, and gave Thee drink:

38. When saw we Thee a stranger, and took Thee in: or naked, and clothed Thee:

39. Or when saw we Thee sick, or in prison, and came unto Thee:

40. And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto Me.

These words are a far cry from the conduct of Hiss. It may be that Acheson felt that the jury in finding Hiss guilty had done it unto Acheson.

In thus seeking to "steal the livery of Heaven, to serve the Devil in," Dean Acheson overlooked the fact that the Devil himself, when it suits his purpose, quotes the Scripture.

In the fourth chapter of this same Gospel by St. Matthew we read:

Then was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the Devil.

2. And when He had fasted 40 days and 40 nights, He was afterward an hungred.

3. And when the tempter came to Him, he said, If Thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread.

4. But He answered and said, It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

5. Then the Devil taketh Him up into the holy city, and setteth Him on a pinnacle of the temple.

6. And saith unto Him, If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down; for it is written, He shall give His angels charge concerning Thee; and in their hands they shall bear Thee up, lest at any time Thou dash Thy foot against a stone.

7. Jesus said unto him, It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.

You can now understand why from all over the land there is a demand by the people of this country that Secretary of State Acheson should be fired by President Truman. He is impudent, incompetent, inept, supercilious and a failure in the office he holds. His attitude and his words are without a parallel in all the history of our country. We will never get rid of the disloyal element in the State Department until President Truman gets rid of Acheson.

In the face of the complete collapse of all our prestige and influence on the continent of Asia, certain editorial writers and commentators are undertaking to make the people of this country believe that Acheson is a man of great ability, and they actually tell us that he is increasing in stature.

In the light of his utter failure, he is a Lilliputian in stature, and by his own words and proclaimed friendship with men like Alger Hiss, he has demonstrated his utter unfitness for the office he now holds.

Not only is this country on the run in Asia, but within the past few days we have again been confronted with the humiliation of a renewal of the German blockade of our forces in Berlin. We seized a building in that portion of Berlin which our forces occupy and then hurriedly turned it loose when the Russians began to hold up train and truck service into and from that city.

Dean Acheson might read with profit the words of St. Paul in the seventh verse of the sixth chapter of Galatians:

Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.

The Secretary of State has sown to the wind. He is reaping the whirlwind of an outraged public opinion.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] and I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, every cotton farmer has known for 6 or 8 years that a control program on cotton would eventually become necessary, that if a support price should continue to be available controls would finally have to be invoked. But the producers could not accurately foresee just when the control program would be placed into operation.

In 1948 farmers did not know when there would be a control program. There are a number of producers who went out into the new areas, broke up the sod land and began to produce cotton. Many of them did not get it planted in 1948, but they first planted cotton in 1949. This amendment by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] would give a measure of relief only to the people who placed land under cultivation under those circumstances. It would not give them a 30-percent factor. It would give them only 30 percent of the land they actually planted in cotton, which is a very minimum amount.

The amendment is not subject to misinterpretation. The meaning is clear.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few observations about the pending measure. I am not now speaking of the pending amendment for growers on new land.

The present law is not perfect. It must be improved from time to time. Even if a law should be perfect, inequities would develop in the administration of the law. Producers in several of our west Texas counties have been especially hard hit by the present law. They have felt the inequities which have developed and they have every right to seek relief. I have in mind a cotton-producing county in west Texas with a cotton factor of only 12 percent. The pending measure will no doubt be of assistance to the producers in such a county. I know that the Committee on Agriculture is trying to be helpful in a very difficult situation.

And the situation is difficult. The pending measure will bring about a condition in counties which have a factor of less than 40 percent where some producers will have larger allotments percentagewise than their neighbors. Generally speaking, cotton producers do not like that. A great majority feel that each cotton farmer in the county should have the same percentage of his cotton land allotted to cotton. Everyone will recall that the so-called 40–50 amendment in the old law was a sore spot in many communities despite the fact that in some instances it served a good purpose.

Let us hope that the pending measure which is designed to take care of unusual situations and be of some assistance in righting special cases of hardship may achieve its purpose without doing injury to the over-all cotton-acreage program. In my opinion, it is impossible to know with complete certainty just what action Congress should take at this time, especially in view of the fact that the new cotton program has been in operation for such a short time.

Let me say to the Committee on Agriculture that in my opinion the farmers of the Nation appreciate the diligent efforts which they have made in behalf of agriculture. Generally speaking, the congressional district which I represent has fared much better than some other areas, but even so, four or five counties in my area have very low and inadequate allotments and producers are confronted with a serious situation. I have felt it my duty to be of every possible assistance to them.

I realize that there is no perfect answer to the problems of agriculture.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. Do I understand that the growers of the gentleman's district will profit by this amendment?

Mr. MAHON. Speaking of the Regan amendment, a few will. It would mean probably a few thousand acres to my district. A few of the producers on new land who have allotments of about 9 percent would profit. But, of course, the factors in the counties in my congressional district range from 12 to 58 percent. Most of the counties and producers in my congressional district have reasonably good cotton factors. My concern now is to be helpful to producers who are in difficulty.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman spoke of certain counties in his district; I was wondering if Dawson County, which now has an allotment of 228,000 acres, or if Lubbock County, which now has an allotment of 248,000 acres, or Lynn County, which now has an allotment of 203,000 acres, would get additional allotments under this amendment.

Mr. MAHON. I do not know, personally, but I think a few would. However, a very limited amount of new land was placed in cultivation in the three counties in late 1948 or 1949. In the counties adjoining Dawson or near to Dawson County that have a factor of 15 percent, 20, and 12, a few farmers in those counties would profit from the Regan amendment. And these low-factor counties are desperately in need of relief. In these counties both the old and new growers should be afforded relief. I grant you that under the bill which the committee itself presents they will get some limited relief.

Mr. PACE. But on the whole, the gentleman is pretty well satisfied with the situation; is he not?

Mr. MAHON. I would say that the cotton producers in three-fourths of the counties which I represent are pretty well satisfied with the situation and they are grateful for the work of the House Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. Gladly.

Mr. ABERNETHY. When did the people start clearing this land?

Mr. MAHON. In 1947 or 1948. It takes a little time to grub and clear it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Did they not clear it with notice that there was a cotton law on the statute books at the time which was subject to being reinvoked by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. MAHON. They thought the law would be rejuvenated, but under different circumstances, because no 27,000,000-acre allotments as provided in the old law would be tenable under the new law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for two additional minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman how we would identify what would be known as a new 1949 cotton farm in view of the fact that farms, although they are not new and have been in cultivation for many, many years have not been planted to cotton in the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, but were planted to cotton in 1949. They were considered new under the bill we passed last year. How does the gentleman define them now?

Mr. MAHON. The amendment is very clear on that; it is very simple. The amendment states:

> Notwithstanding any other provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, the cotton acreage allotment of any new 1949 cotton farm which was completed for planting prior to March 29, 1949, by clearing, plowing, and cultivating the land and was planted to cotton for the first time in 1949, and which was not planted to any crop prior to 1949, shall be not less than 30 percent of the acreage of such farm which was planted to cotton in 1949.

As I interpret the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] it is very clear what a new farm is. But the gentleman has a very important point. For example, a man wants to change his farming practice. He wants to get out of livestock, he wants to get out of wheat, or he wants to get out of cotton. The gentleman raises a very pertinent question, but it is not a criticism of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. The amendment applies only to land cleared and put in cultivation for the first time in 1948 and 1949.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not criticizing the amendment. I am wondering why a person who would be caught in a situation such as the gentleman has described would be any different from a man who owns land that had been in cultivation prior to 1949 and had no history in 1946, 1947, and 1948.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment which is now before the committee and which is identified as the Regan amendment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] have expressed some of the thoughts which I had, in support of the amendment; so I will confine my remarks to the statement that I think it would be a dangerous thing for agriculture if we permit the thought of monopoly to creep into the control and regulation of agriculture in the United States.

I represent an area which grows a small amount of cotton. When you gentlemen from the South speak of thousands of acres, there is nothing like that involved in my support of this particular amendment. I do know of several areas, one of them in my district, in which many farmers are returned veterans and who were making a kind of history which we felt was necessary at the time the cotton farmers were making the history which brought them under the Cooley bill without this amendment.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Does the gentleman realize there are 128,000 acres reserved for just such actual cases in the State of Texas?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. There may be, but I may also tell the gentleman that it has been difficult to get any of the reserved acres used in the area of which I speak; therefore, if we are to depend upon an interpretation by the Department of Agriculture in order to put the benefits of the bill without amendment into effect, then we are leaning upon a very weak reed. The interpretation has not been available with the original act, so an amendment of this kind becomes an increasing necessity.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WHITE of California. I want to make it perfectly clear that the gentleman from Alabama is apparently under a misapprehension. The reserve cannot be used for 1949 farms, which is what we are talking about now.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. Does not the gentleman from California have to go further and say that 700,000 acres in Texas could have been reserved for new farms and these are classed as new farms?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The gentleman will remember that I do not live in Texas, the gentleman will also remember that I am speaking of newer areas in Texas or California or elsewhere, particularly from my own personal knowledge in California, which are being affected by the monopoly in agriculture. These areas are allotted no peanut land, these areas have had no potato land, these areas have had no wheat land, and now, under the bill, without the Regan amendment, these areas have no cotton land. The cotton reduction has been 81 percent in the area I am talking about and while this might mean only about 800 acres in the area of which I spoke, the amendment, nevertheless, should be adopted.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to a communication which I received from the Department of Agriculture dated January 27. With reference to this pending amendment, and speaking about the amendment, Mr. Woolley, Deputy Administrator of the Production and Marketing Administration, has this to say:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1950.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
United States House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. COOLEY: This is in reply to your telephone request of this morning with respect to the Department's views on a proposed amendment to House Joint Resolution 398. The proposed amendment will read as follows:

"SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, the cotton-acreage allotment of any new 1949 cotton farm which was completed for planting prior to March 29, 1949, by clearing, plowing, and cultivating land, and was planted to cotton for the first time in 1949, and which was not planted to any crop prior to 1949, shall not be less than 30 percent of acreage of such farm which was planted to cotton in 1949."

It is our feeling that such an amendment would be unfair to other old growers in the same county which had a county factor of less than 30 percent, and also to other 1949 growing areas, particularly where the farm had been cleared in 1947 or 1948 and devoted in those years to a dry-land crop, such as grain sorghums, and on which new wells had been placed for the growing of cotton in 1949 for the first time. Such farms, under the language, would be excluded. In other words, the farmers for which the amendment is designed were raising sheep or cattle prior to 1949 and wanted to go into cotton. Farmers in other areas were growing grain sorghums prior to 1949 and wanted to go into cotton. Giving relief to one group and not to the other would be manifestly unfair. This does not mean that the Department is suggesting that the amendment be revised to include the latter group, because if such action is taken it would probably result in thousands of additional acres being allotted in 1950 which cannot be justified.

It is impossible to relieve all inequities by an amendment at this time without, in effect, permitting all producers to raise as much cotton as they would desire. Many inequities will have to be straightened out next year through legislative and administrative devices.

In view of the foregoing, the Department does not believe it would be wise to include the amendment suggested.

Very truly yours,
FRANK K. WOOLLEY,
Deputy Administrator.

That is the position of the Department of Agriculture, and in concluding my remarks I would like to reemphasize the fact that in the State of Texas, as has just been said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], more than 700,000 acres of land could have been reserved for new growers. The chairman of the State Committee, I think it was, urged our committee to provide a reservation of acreage, and we finally made the reservation, and then he only reserved about 3 percent for the very purpose that the gentleman, who is now asking for additional acreage, mentioned.

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REGAN. Is it not also true that the Department does not favor the pending resolution?

Mr. COOLEY. No, sir. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WORLEY] just read into the RECORD a letter to me by the Acting Secretary of Agriculture in favor of the pending resolution.

Mr. REGAN. Are they not opposed to the addition of any acreage?

Mr. COOLEY. No; the Department is in favor of adding on the amount of acreage required to eliminate these inequities.

Mr. REGAN. Those 700,000 acres that the gentleman says might have been allocated to Texas were not allocated, and that is not the fault of the farmers we are trying to help.

Mr. COOLEY. That is right, it is not the fault of the individual farmer, but it is certainly the fault of the committee in failing to carry out the intent and the purposes of the law.

Mr. REGAN. Does the gentleman not agree that those farmers are entitled to some consideration at this time?

Mr. COOLEY. I sympathize with them very much, but they are not entitled to any more consideration than other farmers who perhaps have peculiar situations. If this amendment is adopted, I am sure it will be followed by every conceivable amendment to take care of veterans and others who returned from the war and who had not gone in the cotton-growing business before 1949, and there will be nc end to the burdens to be added.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. I want to say in defense of the chairman of the Texas State PMA Committee, who did ask that we put in this bill 10 percent State reserve, that he thought with this 10-percent State reserve he could take care of all of these injustices just now described. I talked with him just as lately as last Friday, and he explained again, as he has several times, that the reason the State committee in Texas did not use the full 10 percent was that Texas was by design or inadvertence placed under the California gadget whereby we were not given credit that we had been promised for the war crops, resulting in the fact that more than 50 counties in Texas now receive a county factor of less than 10 percent. Mr. Vance explained, and I can understand his position, that he simply did not have the heart and the State committee did not feel justified in going into a county that had a 6 percent county factor or 1.6 percent county factor, as one of the counties has, and taking from those people that had practically no allotment at all, even that which they had, to give it to somebody in some other part of the State. Had he not been drawn under this California gadget, I have no doubt that the Texas State committee would have used this reserve and would have corrected these inequities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 15 minutes, 5 minutes to be reserved to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. POULSON].

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate my esteemed colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] on offering this amendment.

I come from a district which has no cotton except probably that which is in the drug store or the hospital, but we are going to have to vote on this bill. Apparently there is a necessity for regulating the amount of cotton to be grown in this country.

We know that the big problem we have confronting us today is farm surpluses and taxation. When we vote on this, we want to know that it is going to be fair.

It has been but a few years ago that we heard probably some of the Members who today have been discussing this bill so freely rise on this floor and talk about how we should raise more food and fiber. The head of our administration has been advocating the same thing.

It has taken the veterans 2 or 3 years to get started. The reason they started in 1949 was that they could not get started immediately upon their return. If you were to ask me what my opinion is at this time, it seems to me that they have arranged a bill which is taking care of the farmers who were in the business during the wartime, who were raising crops that were needed at the time, such as peanuts and the like, and now they are allowing them to come back and raise cotton and crowd out the veterans.

I think this amendment is nothing else but a fair attempt to bring equity to this resolution, and I certainly advocate its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE].

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Chairman, I regret to find myself on the other side of the fence from the distinguished committee that is doing so much to help my own community.

This amendment has equity on its side.

While home during the holidays a lady called me to tell me that her husband had died and left her some brush land, and that last year she had gone to the expense of clearing that land, spending more than $60 an acre, and had planted it to cotton.

Under the present regulation and interpretation she gets no acreage at all for cotton. There are many, many people under similar circumstances who will suffer irreparable harm unless some type of amendment such as this is passed. I say to the Committee that I do not want this amendment at the expense of House Joint Resolution 398 for I am convinced that it will do more for the agricultural economy of America.

This is a problem, however, that ought to be recognized in fairness to many people who have gone to great expense putting land into cultivation. It is different from an old farm which was cleared many years ago and which has not been cultivated to cotton for 10 or 20 years. Today I would say it will cost between $60 and $100 an acre to clear brush and to plow land and put it into cultivation. Many people have that type of investment in their land today and have no way of getting that investment back unless they can have an allotment of acreage for cotton. This is a very difficult problem and I want, with all the sincerity at my command, to commend this splendid committee for the consideration they have given to this bill. It means food, clothing, and shelter for thousands of people whom I represent. I am deeply grateful to you, but this amendment raises a problem which cannot be pushed aside lightly; to do so will result in injury to people who need your consideration. Perhaps 30 percent is high considering the factors in other counties, but if this general amendment passes, it will be below the general level. I hope you will seriously consider this amendment.

You gentlemen of the Committee realize what the problem is and you realize we are trying to be unselfish in our views. You realize also that unless we bring this to your attention and insist on its adoption we would be doing an injustice to hundreds of people whom we represent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MILES].

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, being of the old school, which thought that demand and supply was the basis on which to establish prices, I am just a little at a loss to know what to advocate sometimes. But we have strayed away so far from that point I doubt if we could find our way back. It has become necessary, of course, to find some other formula. I want to say in behalf of the people of New Mexico that we cannot grow cotton out there unless we have water and unless we have irrigation in some form. The development of the Conchas Dam in the last few years has put a great deal of land under cultivation. These people have prepared their land to plant the cotton. A great many of them did not get to plant until 1949. Unless this amendment goes through, I do not see how they will have an opportunity to come under this and to benefit in any way.

Also in the last few years there have been shallow wells discovered in some parts of the country where irrigation has made it possible to grow cotton. These people have gone to expense in preparing their land and buying the machinery and planting cotton. If they are going to be put in this situation, they will not be able to recover any of the expenses they have been put to unless they are able to grow some cotton.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, the 1949 cotton acreage plantings were eliminated from the base years for a specific purpose. That purpose came to light back in the fall of 1948 when it became necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to consider whether or not quotas and acreage allotments would be imposed for the year 1949. The supply was such that by only a few thousand bales did the Secretary avoid declaring quotas for 1949. That being the case, farmers throughout the entire Cotton Belt believed that quotas and acreage allotments were almost definitely certain for the year 1950. Therefore, it was reasonable to assume, and the assumption was correct, that cotton farmers throughout the belt would materially increase their plantings in 1949. They looked to 1949 as the last year of free and unlimited plantings with high supports. Realizing, too, that the acreage to be later allotted would be based to a large degree on history, the urge existed to plant the fence corners in cotton in 1949. This would have been disastrous. Almost everyone agreed that plantings for 1949 should, therefore, be taken out.

It was the opinion of the Committee on Agriculture that if 1949 plantings were eliminated an acreage race would be avoided. Therefore, we brought a bill to the House, and this House and the Senate adopted it, and the President signed it. Now, I do not think it is fair, after notice has been served on all cotton growers, including the old growers, if you please, that we should now come along and give credit only, by this amendment, to the new growers of the western areas, whereas the old growers themselves have been barred from taking credit for the 1949 plantings.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I yield.

Mr. BENTSEN. Do you remember the effective date of that law?

Mr. ABERNETHY. No; I do not remember the effective date, but I do remember that the newspapers, as early as October 1948, carried considerable information that 1949 plantings should and more than likely would be eliminated.

Mr. BENTSEN. Does the gentleman know that my crops were planted in my district before the effective date of the law?

Mr. ABERNETHY. That might be true. Farmers all over the belt were similarly affected. However, there was considerable notice in the press that 1949 plantings would not be taken into account. By the pending amendment you would give the so-called new farmers of the West 30 percent of their 1949 plantings whereas the counties might have a factor of not more than 10 or 15 percent. That certainly is not fair.

Furthermore, there are thousands of farmers throughout the Cotton Belt who have not grown cotton but who today would like to have and are demanding cotton acreage. This amendment gives them no acreage. Why should they be treated differently. So far as cotton is concerned, their farms also constitute new farms. Why eliminate every old farm in the Cotton Belt just because it has not grown cotton? If the amendment is to be adopted then certainly it should be redrafted to include the old farms which have no cotton history.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY] has expired.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to yield my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GATHINGS]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE] is recognized.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize again my support of the Regan amendment. I want to point out to the Members that the people in the district represented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] have, in effect, been subjected to an ex post facto law. We all know that is against the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, which plainly says that no ex post facto law shall be passed.

The effective date of Public Law 28, which eliminates the 1949 cotton acreage from consideration in establishing quotas, was February 28, 1949, long after many thousands of acres had been planted in the gentleman's district.

I submit to you that it is unfair, inequitable, and unjust to allow people to expend their personal fortunes, in many cases young veterans, to the full extent of their capital, in the preparation of this land and the buying of equipment, and then turn right around and pass this ex post facto law—in spirit at least—and completely confiscate the property of those people. It is not right and I hope the Regan amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Notwithstanding the views of the committee, has not the gentleman supported amendments that would tend to increase allotments?

Mr. WHITE of California. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but would he repeat his question?

Mr. COOLEY. Has not the gentleman supported, actively, amendments which have been proposed to this bill, the purpose of which would be to increase acreage?

Mr. WHITE of California. My answer to that is "No; I have not."

Mr. COOLEY. Has the gentleman opposed any of them?

Mr. WHITE of California. Certainly I have; I voted against the Whitten amendment.

Mr. COOLEY. The Whittington amendment was to cut the acreage down.

Mr. WHITE of California. No; the Whitten amendment would increase the acreage.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] claimed that it would decrease acreage.

Mr. WHITE of California. No; the gentleman from Mississippi wanted more acreage.

Mr. COOLEY. Does the gentleman mean the Whittington amendment or the Whitten amendment?

Mr. WHITE of California. Whitten.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman voted against that?

Mr. WHITE of California. I voted against that.

Mr. COOLEY. Does not the gentleman want this program to be fairly put into operation?

Mr. WHITE of California. I certainly do.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman heard me read the letter from the Department which said that this amendment would result in even greater inequities than now exist.

Mr. WHITE of California. I did not so understand the letter or interpret it.

Mr. COOLEY. That is what it said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let me say first that I hope no one thinks it is a pleasant task to come here and oppose these amendments. It would make me feel so much better if I could recommend their adoption. Let me say, secondly, that I hope no one here thinks this is a veterans' amendment. The remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. POULSON] would leave the impression that this is just a group of veterans trying to get help, but the gentleman from Texas made no such statement. There are veterans and nonveterans involved here; on 50, 60, or 70 percent of the cotton farms of the Nation there is a veteran involved. When you affect the rights of one you affect the rights of the others.

Here is the issue, Mr. Chairman; I feel very deeply about this proposal. The first day of the last session of Congress a bill was introduced to outlaw new cotton acreage planted in 1949. Here are the figures: In 1948, 23,148,000 acres were planted in cotton; in 1949, 27,359,000 acres were planted in cotton. In other words, over 4,000,000 extra acres of cotton were planted in 1949. That was outlawed, we passed a special act last year that it would not be counted. We now are asked to open the door to 1949, not for the farmers across this Nation who planted the 4,000,000 extra acres, but for one little area that they say will take only 50,000 acres to satisfy. For my part, you may do as you please, but if we are going to open the 1949 door and take 1949 cotton acreage into account, then on my bended knees I ask you to open the door wide and let every farmer across this Nation who planted this extra 4,000,000 acres in 1949 get credit for it.

Here is the story: These gentlemen came before our committee in February. Never have we had a more earnest witness than the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN]. They brought these growers here and they told us they were going to clear all this land and they wanted a special allotment. That was in February 1949. We told these gentlemen that we were going to put in the bill a provision to take care of them, that we were going to give the State of Texas, the State committee, the right to reserve 10 percent of the allotment made to that State. Here are the figures: The State of Texas has already received a cotton-acreage allotment of 7,637,000, more than one-third of all the cotton acres of this Nation. The Texas committee had the right—hear me, please—the Texas committee had the right to reserve 763,000 acres to take care of what? Wait a minute, to take care of what? Trends and new farms, and every one of these new farms that you are now asked by this amendment to make a special allotment for can be considered as new farms. They tell us that as new farms they have already gotten from 8 to 10 percent of what they put into cotton in 1949. I dare say this is as liberal or a more liberal allotment than any other new farm in any State in the United States.

What are you doing on top of that? This is a piece of permanent legislation these gentlemen are proposing. They propose here that regardless of how you cut cotton acreage in years to come, it does not make any difference how low you make it, down to 12 or 15 million acres for the Nation, this particular group will always get 30 percent of what they had in cotton in 1949.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Does the gentleman agree that at the present time we are considering new legislation and that that will outmode this particular legislation?

Mr. PACE. The gentleman has not come in here with a 1950 amendment. He has come here with a piece of permanent legislation and if we write it in then it is in there and it will take lots and lots of work to ever get it out. It would be a piece of permanent legislation, I repeat, and should not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BECKWORTH:

Page 4, after line 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 5. Section 346 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) The penalty provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to cotton produced by any person who is recognized by the county committee as being a cotton farmer if his total acreage does not exceed 5 acres.'"

And on page 4, line 7, strike out "SEC. 5" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 6."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, in presenting the point of order I wish, first, to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this is a temporary 1950 emergency resolution which says at the outset "that, nothwithstanding the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, including Public Law 252," these changes shall be made for the year 1950.

We submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment now offered by the distinguished gentleman from Texas is an amendment to amend Public Law 272. It is permanent legislation. It would change the eligibility, among other things, of those who shall participate in a cotton referendum.

We submit, Mr. Chairman, it is not germane or relevant to the pending resolution and, therefore, should not be considered at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the gentleman from Texas like to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BECKWORTH. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this legislation which we have proposed here today definitely has the effect of amending the legislation pertaining to cotton-acreage allotments, and therefore the amendment that I have offered, which is along the same line, is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

The amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] provides that section 346 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, is amended by adding to the end thereof the following, and so forth.

House Joint Resolution 398 now before the Committee provides for a modification of certain provisions of existing law for 1 year, of a temporary nature. The pending resolution does not amend numerous features of existing law and is of a temporary character. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas proposes to amend existing law, and if adopted, would become permanent law.

The Chair is, therefore, constrained to rule that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is not in order to the pending resolution, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BECKWORTH:

"SEC. 5. Section 346 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(f) The penalties provided for in this section shall not apply with respect to cotton produced by any veteran of World War II who is recognized by the county committee as being a cotton farmer if his total production of cotton does not exceed 5 acres. As used in this subsection the term "veteran of World War II" means a person who served in the active military or naval service of the United States on or after December 7, 1941, and before September 3, 1945, and who has been honorably separated from such service.'"

And on page 4, line 7, strike out "SEC. 5." and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 6."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order to give me an opportunity to discuss this amendment for 5 minutes?

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I will withhold the point of order.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I am deeply grateful that the gentleman saw fit to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. I would just like to make the announcement that our committee is meeting next Tuesday, February 7, to consider any permanent changes in the law.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I think that is very timely.

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say on August 3, 1949, when I was undertaking to offer some of these amendments, and when I did not have much time to discuss them, I said there would be many changes made. I am happy to say that on October 19, when I could not get one moment of time to repeat the seriousness of our problem I said there would be a lot more changes made. The gentleman from Wisconsin, Representative MURRAY, yielded to me for brief observations. I say to this House today in spite of the fact that a lot of work has been done on this legislation, in spite of the fact that some of you feel it is a pretty good piece of legislation, that many more changes are going to be made.

Why do I say that? Because this falls far short in treating fairly many of the cotton producers of this whole Nation. You know, I was interested a while ago in what was said about Dawson County. I did not mean to mention Dawson County. Dawson County has less than 20,000 people. Dawson County has about 1,400 farms. Fourteen east Texas counties that have, however, half a million people, with 43,000 farms, received less cotton allotment than that one county. I do not envy the good people of that county. I am glad they are prospering; I want them to prosper in the future. However, in all fairness the people of my section deserve to have a living—this legislation to endure must be on a live and let live basis. Contrast 43,000 farms with 1,200 farms. Contrast 20,000 people with almost half a million people, and you see why I contend this legislation is going to be changed, and it is going to be changed a whole lot.

The amendment I offered, and which I regret was ruled out on a point of order, would simply give a small farmer 5 acres of cotton.

I have often wondered why the great Committee on Agriculture of the House and the Committee on Agriculture in the Senate devote as little time as they do on the question of minimums for family-sized-farm operators. I do not say these committees have never considered minimums, but I never have seen a great deal of evidence that there has been any unusual effort made to guarantee to genuine family - sized - farm operators enough acreage of peanuts and cotton to be assured of the privilege to continue to farm. In my opinion this problem will have to be given much more attention in the future than it has been given in the past.

I read into the RECORD yesterday a list county by county showing conditions that exist in certain east Texas counties. One county has a thousand farms among which to distribute a thousand acres. What will be the plight of those poor farmers that are run off because they get but an acre apiece? They must seek relief—relief which today does not exist for them. Another tragic thing which relates to them, as I understood it, is, in the main, they will not even be privileged to vote in the cotton referendum this fall.

I think the Committee on Agriculture does have a significant job to perform in rewriting this cotton-acreage legislation, because there are literally thousands of these people in the South. I was interested in the plea that was made here a while ago for a relatively few people in about four or five counties in Texas at the most. You would have thought that was indeed a serious situation, and it is exceedingly serious—I voted to help the people of Reeves and Willacy Counties and counties similarly affected—but where they were talking about hundreds, or only a very few thousand people, this refers to literally tens of thousands of people.

In the section from which I come, I repeat, as I put in the RECORD and no one has sought to challenge it, there are thousands of people who will be thrown off the farms—by no means are all of these from Texas.

I have a letter here from a banker, who says that a good man came into his bank wanting a loan. He has no peanuts and has no cotton allotted to him. He doubtless is told, "You grow something else." Yes, they tell him to grow something that is likely not to have price support. That is what you are telling these people to do. I submit it is unfair. I submit that it is unjust. I submit that it is unsound, and ultimately will not prevail in such a form.

I desire to include other communications:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, January 6, 1950.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is to confirm answers to the questions you discussed yesterday with Mr. Ray Hurley, Chief, Agricultural Division of this Bureau.

According to the 1945 census there were 601,273 farms with 9 acres or less of cotton harvested. These farms with 9 acres or less of cotton harvested produced a total of 2,386,668 bales of cotton or an average of 3.97 bales per farm. If these farms were limited to a maximum production of 4 bales each, then the maximum total cotton production on such farms would be 2,405,092 bales. As we have pointed out, we do not know how many of these 601,273 farms produced more than 4 bales of cotton in 1944. If it could be assumed that there are now 1,500,000 farms producing cotton and that the same proportion of these 1,500,000 farms as in 1944 grew 9 acres or less of cotton, then 740,700 farms would have 9 acres or less of cotton. If each of these 740,700 farms were limited to a maximum production of 4 bales each, the maximum total production of such farms would be 2,962,800 bales.

According to the United States Department of Agriculture, approximately 32,200 farmers producing Irish potatoes were eligible for the price-support program in 1948. In 1944 there were 2,105,757 farmers producing Irish potatoes. The 32,200 farmers eligible for the price-support program is equivalent to 1.5 percent of all farmers harvesting potatoes in 1944. It should be noted that a large number of farmers producing potatoes grew them for use only on the farm. In 1944 only 432,923 farmers reported 1 acre or more of potatoes harvested.

Please let us know if we can be of further assistance.

Sincerely yours,
PHILIP M. HAUSER,
Acting Director,
Bureau of the Census.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your note requesting information on the number of farmers reporting cotton production of four bales or less.

As the Director of the Census indicated in his letter, there has been no tabulation of cotton farmers classified by the number of bales produced more recent than that prepared on the basis of data from the 1940 census of agriculture.

The 1945 census of agriculture was taken by the Bureau of the Census, not the Department of Agriculture. This is true for the earlier agricultural censuses as well.

A special tabulation of the number of cotton farmers classified by the number of bales produced was prepared on the basis of data for 1939 from the 1940 census of agriculture. There was no such tabulation prepared from the 1944 data obtained in the 1945 census of agriculture.

There was, however, a tabulation of cotton farms classified by the number of acres of cotton harvested from the 1944 data. This tabulation indicates that there were 593,790 farms which reported less than 10 acres of cotton harvested. Total production of cotton on these farms was 2,347,216 bales or an average of 3.95 bales per farm.

This is not, of course, an accurate estimate of the number of farms on which cotton production amounted to four bales or less. Undoubtedly, some farms with high yields produced more than four bales or less than 10 acres, while other farms with low yields undoubtedly produced less than four bales on more than 10 acres. These are, however, the only data available since 1939 that shed any light on the question you raise.

Sincerely yours,

H. T. HUTCHINSON,
Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 13, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of December 5 in which you ask for the definition of various types of farmers.

Generally speaking an individual could be identified as several kinds of farmer depending on his experience and the products he was producing: i. e., one man could be a cotton farmer, peanut farmer, rice farmer, and dairy farmer. If you refer to his eligibility for allotments or quotas the requirements are listed in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. A copy of a compilation is enclosed.

We believe our PMA committeeman and other employees who might be called upon to make a decision can make the proper identification of the various types of farmers.

Sincerely,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

GILMER, TEX., January 27, 1950.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regards to this cotton acreage. I planted 16 acres last year and they haven't given me any yet for this year. And I wish you would do something about it—if you possibly can. As I have been to the office three times and signed a little piece of paper and all they do is growl and say they will see what they can do. Lindley, you know how a little old sandland farmer is, he has got to have a little cotton in. I want to cooperate if possible but looks like I just can't.

Yours respectfully,

JIM DAVIDSON.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., November 21, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your memorandum of November 17 regarding the application of the provision of Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, in the determination of State and county allotments where cotton plantings were adversely affected during base years.

As we understand the law referred to above, no provision is made for adjusting State allotments for abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings within the State. However, the law does provide for the State committees to adjust county allotments for abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings with the provision, of course, that any upward adjustments must be offset by downward adjustments in other counties. The State committee in considering this problem had to give weight to (1) abnormal weather, (2) insect damage, (3) soil crusting in irrigated areas, (4) abnormal movement of farm labor to war industries, (5) an abnormal drafting of farm labor into the armed services, and (6) the production of war crops instead of cotton during the base years that were used in computing county allotments. These factors that affect cotton plantings are, of course, difficult to measure and it is more difficult to perform a satisfactory adjustment in county allotments to reflect each of them properly. Therefore, the State committee adjustment was made with this formula:

If the 1947–48 average acreage of cotton planted in a county was less than the 1941 acreage of cotton planted, the allotment adjustment was computed to be the product of such difference and 0.0904686.

The application of this formula to east Texas counties did result in substantial adjustments, in some instances amounting to as much as 25 percent of the county allotment computed in the Washington office.

The law referred to above and the Secretary's regulations do not provide for consideration of abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings on a farm basis except as these relate to the owner or operator serving in the armed forces during 1946 or 1947.

You are assured that consideration has been given to the provision of law on both the county and farm basis in all Texas counties. Additional information needed will be gladly furnished on request.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 21, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 15 in which you have quoted part of a letter from someone who claims that his county did not get credit for cotton war-crop acreages in the distribution of the State cotton allotment to counties and that BAE cotton-acreage estimates for some counties are not correct.

When the provisions of Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, were applied to State acreages and State war-crop credits, it was determined that the 1950 State cotton allotment would be on the basis of 95 percent of the 1947–48 actual average acreage of cotton and, consequently, the State received an allotment of 7,637,029 acres. As the solicitor has interpreted the law, county cotton allotments must be computed on exactly the same basis as the State cotton allotment was computed. Therefore the 1945 and 1946 county cotton acreages, as well as the 1945, 1946, and 1947 county war-crop credits were not used in the computation of county allotments.

During the summer of 1949 all farmers were requested to report crop acreages and land uses for their farms for each of the 4 years 1945–48. The total of the reported cotton acreages for each year exceeded the BAE estimate of county acreage standing on July 1 in nearly all counties in the State. The State total of such reported acreages exceeded the BAE acreage of cotton an average of 32 percent for the 4 years 1945–48. Consequently, it became necessary to reduce reported cotton acreages for overstatement and so that the total thereof for all farms in each county would conform with official acreages that the Department of Agriculture is required to use in the administration of the cotton program. The adjustment of reported acreages was necessary so that the farm cotton war-crop credits could be more accurately computed for the years 1945, 1946, and 1947.

In view of the above conditions that the State and county committees were required to follow, it will not be possible for us to reconsider the county cotton allotment for this county.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 5, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives, Congress of the United States, Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 2 in which you refer to a letter from a Panola County farmer who complains regarding the 1950 cotton-acreage allotment for his farm.

The statements made by this farmer are substantially correct except that he does not know how much adjustment, if any, will be made in his indicated farm cotton allotment by county and community committeemen. As a rule, most county committees have reserved 10 to 15 percent of the county allotment for use in increasing computed farm allotments for farms on which there is justification for more allotment in view of the land, labor, equipment, and need for additional acreage.

Public Law 272 provides for the apportionment of the county allotment (less a small reserve acreage) on the basis of a uniform percentage factor of the cropland in each farm. The farm allotment computed with the percentage factor is limited by the highest cotton history of the farm in the 3 years, 1946–48.

The letter received by you indicates that this farmer was expecting his allotment to be figured on the basis of a percentage reduction from his 5-year average acreage of cotton planted. This approach to farm allotments is, of course, not provided for in the law and often results in a misunderstanding of the percentage of cropland approach to farm allotments.

It is true that the percentage of cropland factors for many west Texas counties are much higher than the percentage of cropland factors for east Texas. This variation is due to the fact that for an average west Texas county more than 50 percent of the total cropland in the county was planted to cotton in the years 1947 and 1948, while in an average east Texas county, less than 15 percent of the cropland in the county was planted to cotton in these 2 years. On the basis of history the reduction in allotments for the two areas is practically identical.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 8, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 5 with reference to a suggestion that minimum 1950 farm cotton allotments equal to 20 percent of the farm cropland be established.

Several proposals have been advanced by various States to amend Public Law 272, Eighty-first Congress, that would provide for a minimum 1950 farm allotment. The one proposed by Southeastern States would provide that no farm would have a 1950 allotment of less than 70 percent of the 1946–48 average acreage of cotton standing on July 1. We feel that the minimum allotment provision should be such that no farm would receive a 1950 allotment of less than 50 percent of the highest acreage of cotton standing on July 1 of the years 1946, 1947, or 1948. No doubt others will advance the proposal that no farm have a 1950 cotton allotment of less than a specified percentage of the farm cropland after other allotment crop acreages have been deducted.

We much prefer the 50-percent proposal or a similar simple proposal since it would be more easily explained to farmers and understood by those who were affected.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 8, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your wire of December 5 regarding the Texas reserve cotton allotment.

Originally 3 percent of the State allotment, or 229,111 acres, was set aside for use in adjusting county allotments for trends in cotton plantings, abnormal conditions affecting plantings, for small farms and for new farms. All of this reserve was allocated, except for about 2,000 acres, prior to the time that county committees were notified of official allotments. We anticipate using the remaining reserve for correcting errors in instances where county committee reserves would not be sufficient. It has been our experience that for the fiscal year of a large program, a small reserve is needed by the State committee so that undue hardship will not result.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 9, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Representative,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 6 in which my assistance was requested in providing for the release and reapportionment of 1950 farm cotton allotments and in getting more consideration for war-crop acreages that were produced instead of cotton in the years 1945, 1946, and 1947.

Public Law 272 passed by the Eighty-first Congress does not contain a provision for the release or reapportionment of 1950 farm cotton allotments. Consequently the Secretary, as well as State and county committees, are not in position to use the release and reapportionment provision. It is our understanding that original drafts of the cotton-marketing quota law did contain a provision for release and reapportionment, but when the conference committee reported out the bill that became law, the release and reapportionment provision was not included. Therefore, the Solicitor and the Secretary feel that they cannot agree to the inclusion of such provision in the Secretary's regulations since the Congress did not include such provision in the final draft of the bill.

In connection with war-crop acreages, the Solicitor has ruled that the Texas allotment and all county allotments must be computed on the basis of 95 percent of the 1947–48 average acreage of cotton to conform with the provisions of Public Law 272. Here again the Secretary, as well as State and county committees, cannot give any additional credit for war-crop acreages since it is felt that the law is specific with respect to treatment of war-crop credits in the determination of State and county allotments.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of November 25 in which you quoted a portion of a letter from Mr. R. C. Miller, Orange Grove, Tex., regarding cotton-acreage allotments.

The formula for apportioning the national cotton-acreage allotment to States, the State allotment to counties, and the county allotment to farms was developed in accordance with the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. In reply to your letter of October 29 we furnished you in considerable detail an interpretation of the allotment formula. At the same time we informed you that, when the formula was applied, it was determined that Texas would receive its portion of the national cotton allotment on the basis of 95 percent of the average acreage actually planted to cotton in 1947 and 1948. This gave Texas a larger allotment than would have been received under the other provisions. We also informed you that the State acreage allotment for cotton, less a reserve of not to exceed 10 percent of the State allotment, is required to be apportioned to counties on the same basis as to years and conditions as is applicable to the State. Therefore, the allotment for Texas, less the State reserve, is required to be apportioned to counties on the basis of 95 percent of the average acreage actually planted to cotton in 1947 and 1948. In apportioning the county allotment to farms, however, the act provides credit for war crops planted in lieu of cotton in 1946 and 1947 as determined by the PMA county committee.

We assure you that the Department officials responsible for the administration of this legislation are in every respect following the specific provisions of the act as written. Also the various measures left to the discretion of the Secretary are being administered within the standards and guides contained in the legislation and in the light of the Department's past experience with similar programs.

The law is very specific with respect to the manner in which allotments are to be made and we are without authority to change its provisions.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH S. TRIGG,
Administrator.

Mr. Chairman, note the letters I include from farmers:

CANTON, TEX., January 12, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have a wife and four children. I was raised on a farm. After spending 2 years overseas in the Navy during the war I came home to start farming for myself. I've done very well up until now. I bought a place this last November through the Farmers Home Administration, but I am going to lose it unless you help me. The farm consists of 161 acres and sold for $9,900. The land has been laying out for several years and therefore I cannot get either a cotton or peanut allotment. It is very good cotton land and I am a cotton farmer. I worked part of the land last year and made about one-half bale of cotton to the acre. Could you tell me what to do? If I lose it, the Government will never buy me another farm. I am sure to lose it unless you can help.

Yours truly,

JOHN T. ATHERTON.

CARTHAGE, TEX., December 6, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LINDLEY: I know that you are a busy man and for that reason I have made it a point not to bother you during your stay in Washington, but there is a matter of great importance facing all east Texans that I want to discuss with you briefly.

East Texas has never been looked on as a cotton-producing area, and as a result our interest is not considered when it comes to formulating cotton-control programs. On the other hand cotton has and still is one of the means of providing the requirements of life for those living on farms here in Panola County. Farmers are now faced with a grave problem if the cotton-control program which is now being considered goes into effect.

One reason we are having a control program is because we have a surplus of cotton, but the little 3-to-10-bale farmer of this county had nothing to do with the surplus we now have. It has been brought about by the 100-to-1,000-bale farmer, and, if I understand the program, he will not be affected as will the little man here. My idea about any program that has to do with the national economy should be a fair and just one for all those who participate in it.

Prewar, we had farmers in Panola, and it is the same all over east Texas, who worked small farms and most of their farm income was from small cotton acreage. During the war they left the farms to go into the shipyards and war plants because they could make more money. All this is past history now, and they have returned to the farm to find out that because they did not work large cotton acreage during the past few years that they are not qualified to work the same acreage as before. In some cases I have talked to farmers who state that they would like to farm but that it takes money to farm and that the proposed farm-control program as now explained to them would not permit the planting of a cash crop to assure them a living.

I understand that we are to have only about 21,000,000 acres to be planted in cotton next year. Why not find out what percent this is of the total tilled acreage and if it is 20 or 30 percent then allow each farm that amount of cotton. In many cases it would not be planted as all farmers do not want cotton and if they did not then we would have just that much less to worry us next year. Give all an equal chance and leave it up to the individual to decide if he wants cotton or not. If the farmers the country over raised as little cotton as do the farmers of Panola County then we would not be faced with cotton-control programs. Even at that they should be allowed to have their just share.

Not only has it affected the farmer but the merchant as well. His business is suffering now and will suffer more next fall if farmers do not have some type of cash crop. Any time you cut the farmers' income off you cut off the merchants because farmers have always spent what they have made, but if they do not have it, then they cannot spend it. This would be a sure way of bringing about a recession or depression. To have a better condition I think the income from cotton should be spread out and not confined to a select few. These farmers who have by overplanting during the past few years brought about a surplus of cotton have made more money than at any time before so why should not they be penalized like the man who did not plant at all or but little?

I may be talking through my nose but this matter has to do with the future welfare of all farmers of this and many other counties of east Texas and, in my way of thinking, should come in for its just share of consideration. Personally I do not intend to plant 1 acre of cotton but I have about 500 acres of farmland and if I did want to plant some cotton I should be given that right. It so happens that I have not had any cotton on my farm for the past few years and I am told that I could not plant any cotton if I wanted to.

I could say much more but the more I say the less likely it will be read, so I will call it a day by saying that you have always taken problems of east Texas to heart and I am sure you will be in there punching on this matter. Seriously, though, Lindley, this is more than a laughing matter and just this week we are carrying out a program of democracy beats communism but the farmers cannot wholeheartedly take part in it when they are being discriminated against as they are in this cotton-control program.

Thanking you for any and all consideration you may see fit to give the above, I beg to remain,

Sincerely yours,

FORREST E. ROBERTS.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 12, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR LINDLEY: I did not plant any cotton in 1946, 1947, or 1948. This year I had a crop and bought a tractor. I have to make special application before I will get to grow any cotton. I owe on my tractor and won't be able to pay for it according to the allotment. I have had the cotton land all the time. I don't think I should be penalized now because I didn't grow cotton the past 3 years.

There are a lot of people around me who are in the same shape I am in. It has been beneficial to our farms and to the price of cotton for us to let land lay out. To restrict the allotment to the last 3 years will certainly penalize the farmers in Van Zandt County. We are wondering if you can help. We have either let our land lay out or have utilized it for something else. We don't see why we can't grow cotton the same as the man who did not diversify and who did not sacrifice in order to reduce the cotton acreage in the first place.

We have already done what the Government is trying to force farmers to do now. We should not be penalized for voluntarily doing that which the Government is now forcing upon us. The fellow who should be favored, instead of favoring him, the Government is penalizing him.

Since 1942 I have been in bad health and couldn't farm until this year. Instead of renting, I let my land lay out. Now I am being penalized because of the bad condition of my health from 1943 to 1948.

Sincerely yours,

OSIE L. SWAIN.

P. S.—I am also informed that those who did not grow cotton in 1946–47–48 will not be allowed to vote in an election scheduled December 15 in the marketing-quota referendum.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR LINDLEY: Your letter received. Was glad to hear from you in regard to our cotton allotment here in Smith and adjoining counties. I do hope that Congress will make some kind of relief for the east Texas farmers when they meet in January. What is going to become of the tenant farmer? They have taken the very smallest acreage that east Texas ever had to figure the acreage by. I have a farm that had planted 20 acres of cotton in 1948, 1947, and 1946. Will be allowed nine-tenths acre in 1951. Everybody can't go in the cattle business, potato, and watermelons. I do not understand why they are cutting east Texas out on the cotton business.

Lindley, I am going to depend on your doing your best to get Congress to modify this law so that east Texas country can have their just rights.

Hoping you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year.

Your friend,

W. H. BOYNTON.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 26, 1949.
Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

KIND FRIEND: I am writing you in regard to our farm program.

To me it seems unjust, as I have 435 acres of land, and 300 acres of this is cropland. When World War II came on all of the tenants left my farm and went to airplane factories and shipyards, and me, not being able to rent any of my land, I went into the stock business a year ago. I was forced by my health to go out of the stock business, so I began to try to rent my land, and in 1949 I did succeed in getting some of my land worked. However, now they tell me because I failed to have any cotton and such like in 1946 and 1947 I am not eligible for any cotton. I do think that they have promised me 4 acres of cotton, and, as you know as a farm boy, I cannot rent my land without some cotton acreage. I do not believe that it was the intention of Congress for all of this land to lay out.

Lindley, as you know, this is my only source of income to exist, and I was wondering if anything can be done at this late hour, so I thought it best that you should know how this set-up is going.

Hoping that you and your family are enjoying the best of health, I am

Sincerely yours,

HENRY A. GODWIN.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regard to my cotton allotment.

I borrowed the money to buy my farm and tractor through the FHA. I can't pay for this without any cotton. The only 3 years that I did not plant cotton was in 1945, 1946, and 1947.

I raised truck and feed. I have one neighbor who got 9 acres. He has not planted any cotton in 10 years. There is plenty of that over the county.

I hate to bother you with this letter, but I sure would appreciate it if you could help me get some cotton.

I have supported you in every campaign that you have made.

Hoping to hear from you soon.

Your friend,

E. J. HALE.

BEN WHEELER, TEX., December 26, 1949.
Mr. BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am a farmer, have farmed in Van Zandt County all of my life, and am 36 years old. Was raised on a 495-acre farm here in this part of the county. My father sold our farm in 1937 and have rented ever since. You might say I was raised in the cotton patch. In the past 3 years I have lived on a place where the landlord worked in town, but he is going to work his place himself next year (1950), so I bought a nearby farm of 460 acres—some 175 in cultivation in 1942. It had 57 acres of cotton allotment in 1941. It had planted 54 acres of cotton on it. (I owe for most of it.) But for the past few years (as the owner was old) he leased it to a man who put cows on it and did not farm it. The place where I have been working has an allotment on the record of my farming, but I have not got any allotment on the farm I bought, where I am moving, because it had no cotton on it in the past 3 or 4 years.

We are calling for help for farms which do not have allotments while others have allotments. Mr. BECKWORTH, the only fair way is to treat everybody alike. I am a farmer. If my neighbor is allowed a certain percent of his cultivation acres, I want the same percent of my cultivation acres. If a cotton renter has to move on a farm where there has been no cotton previously, he can't get any cotton; therefore, he cannot borrow money on his crop. If we don't get the same percent of our cultivation acres of allotment on cotton as our neighbor (who probably doesn't have to change farms), there certainly will be unrest and dissatisfaction.

You cooperation and help will be appreciated.

Yours truly,

S. C. HUFF.

DECEMBER 22, 1949.
Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am writing you this letter in behalf of the farmers of East Texas. I shall use myself for example: I live 12 miles east of Tyler on a 175-acre farm. I have farmed all of my life except for the 2 years spent in World War I. During the years 1946, 1947, 1948 I did public work. This year I went back to farming. I have 165 acres in cultivation of which I planted 20 acres to cotton.

The new law which was voted into existence prohibits me from planting any cotton because I haven't any cotton history.

I went to the triple-A office to enter my application for the allotment of the cotton acreage. I was informed that there would be only an acre or so; therefore, I withdrew my application. I have no alternative but try to get a public job, unless I grow cotton regardless of the law.

I am obligated to my family. I have a daughter in college, which I had hopes of seeing finish. I believe that if our lawmakers had experience in farming we would have better laws for the interests of the farmers.

As I see the situation they are penalizing the wrong man, they should penalize the man planting 3,000 acres instead of the man with only 30 acres. The large planter is causing the surplus, not the one that has only a minimum number of acres. Seems to me that the lawmakers are too busy taking care of the big producers and not giving the small producer any consideration at all.

Don't you believe that there is discrimination in this law? In your honest opinion don't you believe it is unconstitutional? The farmers do not need a dole, what they need is a dependable market.

I shall expect you to do the utmost in your power to relieve us of these difficulties. To support my family properly I shall need at least 20 acres of cotton.

Cordially yours,

F. P. BOULTER.

BEN WHEELER, TEX.
L. BECKWORTH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you to see if you can help me get some cotton acreage on this place.

I live on the Paul Gigier place, and it has about 175 acres in cultivation. I raised cotton on this place this year. The 1949 cotton crop was the first cotton crop since 1941. I had 23 acres this year and made 9 bales of cotton. If I could be allowed about 20 acres this year I could make it fine.

I have eight children at home and I have to feed and clothe them.

There are several farmers around me that were allowed good cotton acreage, and yet they haven't planted any cotton in 10 or 12 years.

The banks will not loan money if you don't have some cotton acreage. I have plenty of security to put up to the bank but they will not loan any money unless you have a cotton crop.

Mr. BECKWORTH, I need some cotton acreage bad, and I will deeply appreciate your cooperation.

Yours truly,

W. H. HOPSON.

P. S.—I have no other means of supporting my family other than raising cotton. Thank you.

GRAND SALINE, TEX.,
December 23, 1949.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I did not get any cotton acreage for the year of 1950. I wonder just why. Seems to me like it was an unfair thing. They tell me it was because I did not have cotton in 1946, 1947, 1948.

I had truck crops and seems they did not give me credit for any war crops. Way things are going to be next year we may not be able to sell truck stuff, and we have a farm to pay for. I am expecting you to do all you can to help me get an allotment. I think each farm should have a few acres; don't you?

We have 112½ acres and 75 acres in cultivation and are not allowed any cotton at all.

I appreciate whatever you can do to help me.

ARLIE E. HOLLOWELL.

GRAND SALINE, TEX.,
December 15, 1949.

Mr. BECKWORTH,
Gladewater, Tex.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Us farmers are greatly disturbed over this cotton allotment. We are in favor of governmental control of cotton acreage, but us little farmers are not in it at all. I have a little 100-acre farm. Have been in bad health for 5 years. 1947 and 1948 I didn't have 1 acre on my place in cotton, so I am not allowed to vote, or have any cotton either. I am wondering if our Government has completely turned on us little farmers. It seems like the ones that owns thousands of acres of wheat and cotton lands are fully protected. Has our Government forgot the Golden Rule and have they forgot equal rights to all men, special privileges to none?

I have one neighbor who has bought a tractor and the farm he owns didn't have any cotton on it at all in 1947 and 1948. So what is he to do? He is not allowed but very little cotton, if any. I have several neighbors in the same shape. They are poor, hard-working people and good people.

Mr. BECKWORTH, can you get Congress, you and Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. JOHNSON, to have this cotton allotment changed some so the little farmers can live through it? If the farmers all have to plant cabbage, potatoes, tomatoes, and sweet corn for living, there won't be any market for it.

Hoping there can be something done and with best wishes.

W. I. CREW AND WIFE.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., December 16, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Gilmer, Tex.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I imagine you are hearing from quite a few dissatisfied cotton farmers about Government control of acreage. They are all for price supports, however. I see no possible way of having price support without some kind of production control, but the method of determining allotments is very unfair. If we had a law that would prevent a man planting more than 50 percent of his acreage to cotton and preventing planting cotton 2 years in succession on the same land, we would have very little need for price support and no need for any other control of cotton production and such a law would be fair to everybody. Furthermore such a law would be justified as a soil-conservation measure.

If this suggestion meets with your approval, will you please give it your immediate attention at the coming session of the Congress?

Very truly yours,

HOMER E. TUNNELL,
A Retired Cotton Farmer.

Mr. Chairman, note at this point the answer to the Tunnell letter:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
College Station, Tex., December 28, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will reply to your letter of December 22, with which you enclosed a copy of a letter from Mr. Homer E. Tunnell, a retired cotton farmer of Grand Saline, Tex. Mr. Tunnell had suggested that the cotton-acreage allotment and marketing-quota program should prevent a farm allotment in excess of 50 percent of the cropland and should require the rotation of cotton acreage each year.

In general, we agree with the suggestion that a farm allotment should not exceed 50 percent of the cropland in the farm. However, some exceptions need to be made, especially for small farms where a larger acreage of cotton needs to be produced in order that the people depending on the small farm for a living can have sufficient cash-crop acreage for this purpose. Also we agree with the suggestion that cotton acreage should be rotated on the farm each year, but do not feel that such a provision need be written into law. It is the job of the Extension Service, Soil Conservation Service, and others who work with farmers to show that crop rotation is desirable and profitable.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Newton, Tex., December 30, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: The following information is in reply to your request of December 19, 1949:

County cotton-acreage allotment for 1942, 4,096.7 acres. County cotton-acreage allotment for 1950, 714.2 acres.

Since the county allotment for 1950 is so small it is felt that only a small acreage of perhaps 50 would be released for reapportionment.

Our allotments are all very small, which means that landlords who farm themselves will not be able to have any tenants. If each acre of war crops were considered as an acre of cotton, our allotment would probably double, which would be quite a relief over the present situation.

Under the present law we will have an estimated 75 farmers who will not be able to grow any cotton because of the lack of an acreage allotment.

Yours very truly,

T. H. INMAN,
Chairman, Newton County PMA Committee.

TEXARKANA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., January 17, 1950.

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: In reply to your letter of January 3, requesting information on how many fewer jobs are in our locality than were here at the height of the war employment, we have now received this information from the employment bureau.

They advised there are about 7,500 fewer people working in this area now than there were during the peak of the employment during the war. We trust the above answers your inquiry; but if we can be of further service, please do not hesitate to call on us.

Sincerely yours,

L. E. GILLILAND,
Manager.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I make against this amendment now offered by the gentleman from Texas the same point of order that was made against his previous amendment, as they are both identical in form. They seek to amend the same section. They relate to the same section of the permanent law. I say this amendment is not germane to the pending resolution.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same observation here that I made a while ago. I would like to ask the Chair how many parts of the Agricultural Act a given resolution would have to amend in order to be germane?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would meet that question when it arose, if it did arise. This is temporary legislation. For the reasons stated in the previous ruling, the point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, for 1950, the peanut acreage allotment for any State shall not be reduced by a percentage larger than the percentage by which the 1950 national acreage allotment is below the 1949 national acreage allotment. The allotment for any State shall be increased to the extent required to provide such minimum State allotment and such acreage required shall be in addition to the national acreage allotment. The additional acreage authorized by this section shall not be taken into account in establishing future acreage allotments.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIKES: Page 4, line 16, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 6. Any part of the peanut acreage allotted to individual farms in any county for 1950 under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustments Act of 1938, as amended, which will not be planted to peanuts and which is voluntarily surrendered by the owner or operator of the farm to the county committee shall be deducted from the 1950 allotments to such farms and shall be apportioned, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, to other farms in the same county. In any subsequent year, unless hereafter provided by law, acreage surrendered under this section and reallocated pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary shall be credited to the State and county."

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture has done a good job with a very difficult subject. It deserves credit for helping the farmers as much as it has. I wish it had gone further with relation to cotton and peanuts, and in an effort to provide additional help. I offer an amendment, which I hope the committee will not object to. The amendment is intended to help in a small way the peanut producers of the country.

I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered does not provide for one additional acre of peanuts—not one. It does provide for the voluntary surrender of unused acreage allotments of peanuts during 1950 and for their reallocation within the respective counties. It is purely temporary. It is limited to 1950 in its application. It follows the same procedure generally as set out for the surrender of cotton-acreage allotments in an earlier section of the bill, except that it applies only to 1950.

I submit if the recapture and reallocation of unused allotments is good for cotton, it certainly is good for peanuts. If this amendment is rejected, we will not have another opportunity to help the peanut producers during 1950 because time will not allow it. I understand the committee is going to attempt to bring in a peanut bill later. I want you to realize, however, that this is the last day of January. It soon will be time to plant. Unless we do what we are going to do to help the peanut producers in this measure they can get no benefit during 1950.

The thing I have proposed actually would do but little for them. But it would help. I have had many communications from peanut producers. I have talked to many peanut producers who have asked that we at least do this much. As I said, it does not provide for any additional acreage above that the Department of Agriculture anticipated and above that allocated. It does provide for the surrender and reallocation voluntarily under regulations prescribed by the Secretary for unused allotments during this year. I think it is true that the problems of the peanut producer are as great or greater than those of the cotton producer. I would like to point out one or two salient reasons.

Peanut production was expanded tremendously during the war and the expansion materially helped the war effort. This expanded production became an important factor in the economy of the area. Many of these producers are now cut loose without allotments or with very small allotments. Yet they depend more now than during the war upon peanuts.

Here is another. Peanuts must be picked by machine. Yet, there are many small allotments of peanuts, nine-tenths of an acre, for instance. A man with an allotment of nine-tenths of an acre cannot get a picker to harvest his crop. You cannot afford to run a picker into a man's farm to perform the operation of picking his peanuts unless you have 2½ or 3 acres as a minimum.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I note the gentleman's statement that this does not call for any more peanut acreage. Can the gentleman tell us how much this will cost in dollars and cents?

Mr. SIKES. No; I cannot tell you how much it will cost in dollars and cents. I say it will not provide for any more peanut acreage, because it simply provides for the shifting of acreage within the allotment already prescribed. It will cost a little more money because of the fact that some more acreage will be planted which otherwise would not be planted. But it stays within the allotment prescribed by law, and it will help these hardship cases which otherwise would be seriously aggravated by failure to do something for the peanut producers.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. In presenting this amendment, is the gentleman prompted by the fact that inequities exist in the allocation of peanut acreage?

Mr. SIKES. Of course there are inequities in the allocation of peanut acreage. There are inequities in all allotment programs. But beyond and above that fact is the fact that we have men who have such small acreages of peanuts that they cannot make a living without a little help, and I am trying to give them that help.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include some letters.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the bill pending before the House today will, in my opinion, if enacted, correct thousands of inequities in the recent Cotton Acreage Quota Act. I am not certain that the inequities were the fault of the act or the administration of the act. However, I do know that we have thousands of cases in my district where farmers are drastically treated under this act. I am certain the Members of Congress and the farmers are fully aware of the fact that we have a surplus of cotton and are perfectly willing to take a reasonable acreage reduction. However, we do not care to stand idly by and see the farmers who have hundreds of tenants dependent upon them thrown completely out of the cotton business. My personal opinion is that a 30-percent acreage reduction is all the personal economy the farmer can stand at one time without throwing his farming operations completely out of line.

I am enclosing a few letters and wires from some of my constituents which I feel some of the Members of the House might care to read:

"Whereas it is a well-established fact that the main source of income in Lee County is derived from cotton, and that the entire economy of Lee County revolves around the production of cotton; and

"Whereas it was understood by the farmers of Lee County that it would be necessary to cut the cotton acreage approximately 20 percent; and

"Whereas the farmers of Lee County were willing to have their acreage cut by the said 20 percent if it were necessary to maintain the proper price level for cotton; and

"Whereas in allotting the cotton acreage for Lee County for the year 1950 said acreage has been based on figures as compiled by the Bureau of Agriculture Economics, which figures are grossly in error and are resulting in the acreage in Lee County being actually cut from 35 to 40 percent instead of the proposed 20-percent reduction; and

Hon. JOHN L. McMILLAN,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. McMILLAN: For a number of years the USDA has been advocating better cotton gins. They have contended that poor preparation of cotton has caused a lot of low-grade cotton to accumulate in the country. The average ginner in our part of the country has worked for years trying to improve his machinery and have a modern gin plant, and most of them have succeeded in so doing. Many ginners have spent large amounts of money modernizing their plants and most of them have gone in debt to do so.

Recently when USDA planned the present cottonseed-purchase program, they forgot all about the ginners. They set up the program which allowed the ginner $1.50 per ton commission for handling the seed when even the oil mills have always allowed $3 per ton commission, even in the days of the depression. In this same program USDA made no allowance for shrinkage or loss in transit which will be far above the allowed commission. They also allowed ICC rates for transporting the seed to Government warehouses but made no provision for loading or unloading the seed.

The ginners have made a practice for years of making only a small charge for the actual ginning process, but have always received a fair commission for handling the seed. I agree that this condition should not prevail, but it has been practiced for years over a large part of the Cotton Belt.

It seems that the program was drawn up very hurriedly and with not enough consideration. I also realize that this is only an emergency but if the ginners are not reimbursed for their cooperation in this program they will have operated at a loss for the year.

I wish you would please look into this matter and see if there is anything that can be done.

Sincerely yours,

PAGE & CADORETTE,
B. L. PAGE.

LAKE VIEW, S. C., November 1, 1949.
Hon. JOHN L. MCMILLAN,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am objecting to the falsification of records as are being established concerning the 1950 cotton allotment for the county in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration of Dillon County and in the South Carolina statistical records for 1950 cotton allotment for the county in Columbia, S. C.

The AAA of Dillon County on Form CN-337 claim that my farm serial No. 801 (28.8 acres, cleared) planted an average of 6.8 acres cotton for years 1941, 1945, 1946, 1947, and 1948. The same farm for the above-mentioned years was allotted an average of 4.5 acres tobacco with no other allotted crops. The records show that 6.9 acres (1941), 9 acres (1945), 12 acres (1946), 11 acres (1947), and 13 acres (1948) were planted; or an average of 10.4 acres for the above-mentioned years. The above represents a 34.5-percent cut in cotton from the actual acreage planted.

The AAA of Dillon County on Form CN-337 claim that my farm serial No. 7392 (31.5 acres, cleared) planted an average of 7.4 acres cotton for years 1941, 1945, 1946, 1947, and 1948. The same farm for the above-mentioned years was allotted an average of 5.4 acres tobacco with no other allotted crops. The records show that 10 acres (1941), 10 acres (1945), 10 acres (1946), 9.4 acres (1947), and 10 acres (1948) were planted; or an average of 9.9 acres for the above-mentioned years. The above represents at 25-percent cut in cotton from the actual acreage planted.

The AAA of Dillon County on Form CN-337 claim that my farm serial No. 9556 (58.7 acres, cleared) planted an average of 13.1 acres cotton for years 1941, 1945, 1946, 1947, and 1948. The same farm for the above-mentioned years was allotted an average of 10 acres tobacco with no other allotted crops. The records show that 10.4 acres (1941), 16.3 acres (1945), 16.3 acres (1946), 22.8 acres (1947), and 20 acres (1948) were planted; or an average of 17.2 acres for the above-mentioned years. The above represents a 24-percent cut in cotton from the actual acreage planted.

It is generally understood that the Secretary of Agriculture has asked for 20-percent cut in cotton acreage for 1950. If the above farms are cut an additional 20 percent it will be an over-all cut of 47.8 percent. I am willing to accept the 20-percent cut, but the 47.8-percent cut will not be fair nor equal.

Yours very truly,

THOMAS B. SCOTT.

BISHOPVILLE, S. C., December 15, 1949.
Hon. JOHN L. MCMILLAN,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I notice through our county paper that you are meeting with the House Agriculture Committee in regard to the present farm program stating that you are in favor of cutting no one farmer more than 30 percent. I wish to advise that they have cut me to the bone. I have on this farm two families of eight to nine in each a four-horse farm of 101 acres open land in cultivation.

They have given me only 27½ acres to plant in cotton and I have no tobacco or peanut allotments, depending on the cotton as my sole money crop. I have planted an average of 55 acres on this farm for the past 5 years—1944-48—and under the farm program of 1941 they allowed me 40 acres of cotton on the place.

However, it takes four mules to handle this amount of land. I advised one of these families unless I am allowed more cotton acreage I would have to let him go, but he is begging with tears in his eyes to stay on. What am I to do? I can't advance practically nothing to live on.

On account excessive rains didn't make half a crop this year and didn't pay out of debt, and I don't see how I can get along with less than 10 acres to plow, and this would be more than 30-percent cut.

Account of age and health I am not physically able to convert my place to hog or cattle farming, and I hope that you can handle situation for the betterment of a small farmer as myself. Thanks.

Yours very truly,

J. L. SHEALY.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Bishopville, S. C., October 31, 1949.
To All Lee County Cotton Farmers:

Enclosed you will find a form showing where adjustments have been made in the data that you turned in for your farm. These figures might show a reduction in the cotton acres you reported.

The reason for these changes is that Congress so wrote the law that the total county cotton acreage for 1947 and 1948 determines the county allotment for 1950, and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics acreage data for these years is official and departmental regulations require that farm acreage be adjusted so the total equals the BAE figures. The law further states that the farm allotments for 1950 will be determined by a percentage of the total cultivated land on a farm with provisions for small farms, and allotments not to exceed the highest planted acres in the last 3 years.

After studying the situation, the Lee County committee decided that Lee County and each farm in Lee County would receive the same 1950 cotton allotment whether or not these adjustments were made, but that if the adjustments were not made, that the county allotment might be held up and work undue hardship on all cotton farmers. Therefore, with these facts available the county committee decided to adjust these figures with the understanding that they do not reflect the true acreages on any farm and with the further understanding that they will not affect what allotments any farmer might receive, and that if at any time in the future the adjusted figures could affect the allotments that the adjusted figures are to be considered untrue and original figures turned in by the farmer be reverted back for individual consideration.

Very truly yours,

T. F. CLYBURN.
R. E. MCLENDON.
M. G. MCDOWELL.

THE SENATE,
STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Columbia, October 3, 1949.
Congressman JOHN L. MCMILLAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: Mr. Wayne Gamble is a farmer who has 29 families living on a plantation of 1,200 acres of cleared land. On these 1,200 acres he has only 8½ acres of tobacco allotment, which is about one-eighth acre for each family, or about thirteen one-hundredths acre (two rows) to each person on the land. Among this number of people are 7 veterans with their families.

The Government program of the cotton allotment will allow him only 237 acres of cotton for the 1,200 acres for the 29 families of 147 people. That is about 1⅔ acres to the person. There are 7 veterans and their families among this group, allowing 2 acres of cotton to each veteran and his family.

Most of these people are poor farmers who can do nothing but farm. This year they made about one-quarter bale to the acre, because of excessive rains and boll weevils. If this man's farm is not adjusted with the AAA program, the people will not be able to meet the necessities of life the coming year.

I know that the control program might be a necessity, but in this case 147 people cannot make a livelihood on 237 acres of cotton and 8 acres of tobacco.

Please see if you can't do something to relieve this situation.

Yours very truly,

Senator E. W. CANTWELL.

PAWLEYS ISLAND, S. C., December 28, 1949.
Hon. J. L. MCMILLAN,
Florence, S. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have planted from 10 to 40 acres of my 78 acres of farm land to cotton each year for the past 25 years.

While I am a firm believer of letting supply and demand take its own course, and at the same time I want the laws of our country obeyed to the letter.

I have received notice from the county AAA office allotting me 5 acres to plant for crop year 1950.

I have taken the allotment given with the county trustee. They claim they have arrived at the allotment face from their instructions from Washington, D. C.

There must be some misunderstanding if it's necessary to reduce 1950 cotton acreage by 25 percent or more. I should be allotted as much as 10 or 15 acres for 1950 planting. Hoping you will give the matter some consideration.

Respectfully,

G. F. PARKER.

BISHOPVILLE, S. C., January 4, 1950.
Hon. JOHN L. MCMILLAN,
House Office Building:

Proposed amendment copies which you sent to Tom Clyburn and W. P. Baskin, Jr., will not help Lee County or South Carolina according to figures which United States Department of Agriculture intends to use. Department of Agriculture intends to use BAE figures which under proposed amendment would help other States but would not help South Carolina and would confuse and antagonize our farmers much more than present law. Please wire this committee any developments which would help this area.

AUGUSTA, GA., December 13, 1949.
Representative MCMILLAN,
Florence, S. C.:

Protesting the cotton allotment I say the following: I live in South Carolina. Have a farm in Saluda County. Production acreage 1945, 65 acres; 1946, 50 acres; 1947, 48 acres; 1948, 45 acres; 1949, 90 acres. I received my allotment today for 1950 as 17⅒ acres. This reduction is bankruptcy. See if you can't get the proposal put in force proposed by the Texas Cotton Growers' Association at Wichita Falls. I am in favor of a reduction in cotton acreage but not to this extent.

JOHNSTON, S. C.

MARION, S. C., December 9, 1949.
Hon. JOHN L. MCMILLAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The present cotton-control law is grossly unfair and unjust and needs immediate modification, or the rulings of the Department of Agriculture need harmonizing.

I am a very small farmer; have only 91 acres of cultivated land. So, when I write, I am writing as one of the little farmers the administration is always talking about. I am going to vote for crop control December 15. But I want to show you how unfair this law is to me and my tenants. I have five in my family, and had 26 tenants or persons living on my farm in 1949. I now have cut this number for 1950 to 15 persons. In 1944 I planted 34 acres of cotton; in 1945, 32 acres; in 1946, 30 acres; in 1947, 35 acres; in 1948, 35 acres; in 1949, 39 acres. My 1950 allotment is 14.4 acres. I have a tobacco allotment of 14.9 acres. I have always had a surplus of grain and other crops. I have read in the papers that we were to get a 20-percent cut, which I think is fair. In fact, I am perfectly willing to a 30-percent cut, but my cut is approximately 60 percent. And that seems to me to be absolutely out of line with common sense or reason of any kind. I think you should devote some time to having proper changes made in this law.

There is no criticism of the local PMA office or the PMA committeeman, the trouble is in Washington and needs correcting. I hope you will give your immediate, careful consideration to improving this situation.

Yours truly,

WILBUR S. WHITE.

SCRANTON, S. C., December 14, 1949.

Mr. JOHN L. MCMILLAN.

DEAR SIR: I just wish to say I am a farmer of Florence County, at least had been, but it looks like my right to farm has been taken away. I wish to say I had my hands employed for 1950; had advanced some to them. I had a 5-horse farm, planted 25 to 30 acres of cotton; five families on my farm. I received my allotment for 1950 December 11. They gave me 3.1 acres to plant. I want someone to tell me how I am going to farm on 3 acres of cotton for five plows. I have just been reading about some are talking of reshaping the allotment. I would be glad if they could arrange to give every farmer so many acres per plow. I have talked to four farmers with two plows; they got 5 acres. I run five plows and got three. I will have to sell some of my stock and turn off some of my hands. Now they are asking me to vote for cotton. I cannot vote for anything, knowing it is against me. I guess you know how some people are treated around Florence. I say get men that will do the right thing or have nothing. One man showed me his allotment. He has one mule. He got 3 acres. Hope you can help do something when you get back next month.

With best wishes,

V. G. WARD.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in bringing the cotton resolution to the floor of the House, we were prompted to do so because of inequities which exist at the farm level. I think that phase of the program has been discussed adequately. In putting this peanut provision in, we sought to correct inequities at the State level in two States, the State of Alabama and the State of Texas which, unfortunately, were being required to take a reduction substantially below that which was required at the national level.

The purpose of the pending amendment can be but one thing, and that is to increase the production of peanuts, to increase the growing of peanuts, at a time when we have more peanuts than we know what to do with. If it were justified on the ground that some inequity has been done, and the gentleman from Florida was seeking to relieve that situation, it would be quite different, but when the purpose of this is to increase the production of peanuts, which is contrary to the peanut quota law which we have in effect, it is a different proposition.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. How many additional acres of peanuts will the provisions in the bill permit?

Mr. COOLEY. About 100,000 acres.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. So that is in addition to the quotas that were established by the act of 1949?

Mr. COOLEY. That is right. In other words, the limitation in the quota law of 1949 was 2,100,00 acres, and to take care of the State levels in Alabama and Texas about 100,000 acres more will be needed, and will be added by this resolution.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. SIKES. How can my amendment increase the acreage allotment of peanuts?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman did not understand the question asked by the gentleman from Minnesota. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] had reference to the provision which is already in the resolution. The gentleman's amendment will not increase the allotted acreage, but the purpose of it is to increase the planted acres.

I have not received a single communication from a single peanut farmer indicating any inequity in the control program. Neither have I received any indication from any farmer who has received a peanut acreage allotment that he would voluntarily surrender that acreage and permit somebody else to plant it.

Mr. SIKES. I have received communications from both sides, but what I want to ask my friend is, If it is good to surrender the unallocated allotments on cotton land for reallocation, why is it not equally good to do the same thing with reference to peanuts?

Mr. COOLEY. If the gentleman wants my own views about the matter, I am frank to confess that it is nothing on earth but window dressing. That is all it is. What difference does it make whether it is taken out of the air or taken from frozen acreage?

It is all window dressing; it sounds all right to say you are reallocating it so as to bring the man up to 70 percent, but you are going to bring him up to 70 percent anyway. The reason for that provision I think is quite obvious, but the reason for the cotton resolution has a sound justification, and that is that we had wide shifts in the production of cotton; and you, I am sure, realize the importance of the war-crop factor, the diversion program. That in itself has brought about a bad situation.

Mr. SIKES. Then we would like the same kind of window dressing for peanuts. But let me ask, does not your argument apply equally to the man who went into peanut production as a result of the war needs?

Mr. COOLEY. If a man diverted from cotton to peanuts, soybeans, or any other war crop, he was given credit and he was entitled to cotton acreage for such diversion; but that is not so as to peanuts. Where you were growing peanuts you did get credit for cotton. So in the peanut-cotton area you have a rather unusual situation, and as a result of it some of the peanut-cotton growing areas have not been forced to make a contribution to the reduction in cotton.

Mr. SIKES. I am reluctant to take the gentleman's time. But I know that people in my district, and I hear from people in other districts, tell me they are seriously hurt by the present system and they are asking for at least this measure of relief. Let me say again, this is the only chance I foresee to help them this year. I believe what I ask is fair by any standard.

Mr. COOLEY. But they do not say they are unfairly treated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation, as I understand it, is only temporary, stopgap legislation in an attempt, as the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina says, to remove certain inequities at the farm level that have occurred in the administration of the present cotton allotment law.

There is a situation in my own section that is not sufficiently met by this bill. Some amendments have been voted down that would have helped. I want to call attention to it now in view of the fact that the committee will shortly work on a more permanent type of legislation. I have a telegram here sent me by a group of five banks in one county, Shelby, in my district. The telegram is as follows:

TIMPSON, TEX., January 24, 1950.

Judge J. M. COMBS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Very urgent that adjustment be made in current cotton acreage allotment set up for east Texas. This is area of largely small farmers and we cannot lend sufficient sums for subsistence of farmers on present allotments of four to seven acres. Tomato yields and prices always uncertain and cotton is still important to us. This should take priority over other matters now before Congress as time is short for crop planning. May we have your help in this important matter? Please answer.

THE COTTON BELT STATE BANK,
TIMPSON FARMERS STATE BANK,
CENTER STATE GUARANTY BOND BANK,
CENTER FIRST STATE BANK,
TENAHA TEXAS STATE BANK, Joaquin.

Here is a peculiar situation existing at the farm level in certain sections in nine counties of my district, an inequitable situation. It is a region of small farms owned by the people who live on them. When the war broke out a very large percentage of those people went to the armed services and the rest went to the defense plants of the area where I now live. The result was that in the county of Shelby alone, where I grew up, a county of many small farms, the production of cotton dropped from over 30,000 bales per year to less than 3,000 during the war. Those boys came back. I met with 300 of them back in November. Some had been in college. Others had been unable to obtain any Government loans to buy farms until the law was changed last year. Many are just now acquiring little farm homes, but they cannot get an acre of cotton allotment under the present law. Several have written me that they would have to surrender their little farms because of that. They are just getting started. Some are going into stock raising, and poultry, and things like that, but they have to have a period of time to establish their stock and to get something to sell. Now I fear they are going to be denied, by the application of this law, any cotton allotment. The bill will bring a measure of relief to those people who have continued farming cotton—and there are some, of course, in those counties that have; they will get a little relief out of it. But I fear people planting cotton for the first time will not.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COMBS. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Provision was made in the quota law of 1949 for new growers, and had the acreage been reserved, as contemplated by the law, new growers could have been given allotments; but, unfortunately, it was not done. That, however, was not a weakness of the law or a weakness of administration here in Washington; it was a weakness elsewhere.

Mr. COMBS. In other words, it was at the State level; is that right?

Mr. COOLEY. That is right.

Mr. COMBS. Whatever the reason, I know what the result has been throughout the east Texas region that I know so well. The telegram I have just placed in the RECORD from the banks of Shelby County shows the grave injustice that is being done the farmers of the area. I take it from what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] says that the State and county committees in Texas can grant substantial relief to small cotton farmers, when this bill becomes a law—both those who have been growing cotton and those who wish to plant for the first time—particularly young ex-soldiers. Like their forebears before them they want a little farm they can call their own. It is a pretty harsh thing when they cannot get a little cotton allotment to make enough income in cash to pay the installments on the farm home that they have bought. It is a serious situation, and I want the committee to consider it very carefully in the more permanent legislation it brings in. I shall support this resolution because it will bring some measure of relief to many farmers who need it, but I regret exceedingly it is not going further and meet the problem more adequately.

I realize it is a peculiar situation that does not exist everywhere and that the committee trying as hard as it may cannot reach all inequities in hasty legislation. But even so, I wish this bill went further than it does.

I hope the members of the great Committee on Agriculture of the House will give special study to reaching this situation because it would not take a great many acreage allotments to do it—and it is sorely needed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I merely want to straighten out the RECORD. A moment ago during the debate our distinguished chairman mentioned the fact that I had been voting for amendments all day to increase the cotton acreage under this legislation we are considering at this time. I want to point out to him that I have voted for only two amendments, the one I offered myself and the one offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN].

I am sure that our distinguished chairman would want to correct the RECORD, and while I am on my feet I should like to point out that insofar as cotton acreage is concerned I was one of the members of the Subcommittee on Cotton who voted to limit the cotton acreage to 20,000,000 acres instead of the 21,000,000 acres that was finally brought out.

I would be glad to have the chairman correct that impression if he would kindly do so.

Mr. COOLEY. I am delighted to correct the impression if I left the impression the gentleman had voted against all of them. I asked him if he had not voted for amendments which would increase the acreage to be planted to cotton. I am perfectly willing to agree that the gentleman did in committee favor reducing the minimum acreage from twenty-one to twenty million. But what we are trying to do here is to get a fair basis upon which to make future reductions, certainly a fair basis for 1950; then the subcommittee handling the cotton problem will give further consideration to the matter, as indicated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take 5 minutes which is allotted to me nor will I ask for additional time to try to sway this great body that has been sitting here so patiently throughout this debate. I regret that the great Committee on Agriculture, so ably chairmaned by the gentleman from the great State north of the great State of South Caroline has languished and brought forth a mouse on this problem. However, the committee has done something. Even though in your languishing you have delivered to us this poor little emaciated mouse, I shall try to help you nurture it and get it through. I am very much like the man who got his hand in a lion's mouth. He cannot do anything else and he cannot do anything more, if you catch the point.

My farmers are starving by the thousands. Mr. Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, to whom I pay my respects, you at least have started in the right direction and, as my distinguished friend from Texas, another great State of this Union, has so ably observed, you are going to reappraise this situation later on, and when you do, bring forth just a little larger animal, and we will be glad to help you on its way to the fulfillment of the prophecy mentioned for its ultimate future. We have to save these farmers because, brother, they are headed for the boneyard, and mine are no better off than yours. They cannot live on promises. But, at least you brought forth something and I hope it will do some good somewhere down the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SIKES].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). One hundred and fifteen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending resolution conclude in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the debate on this resolution all day yesterday and so far today. I have watched to see what the effect of it would be. I feel that I should call attention to what I believe is in sight. It looks to me as if the cotton part of this resolution will cost the country $130,000,000, at least, and the peanut part of it from twenty-five to thirty million dollars. The country is going to be faced with a similar bill relating to wheat and corn, and maybe something else, and before we get through with the operation of amendments it is going to add an additional cost of three hundred and fifty or four hundred million dollars besides this resolution.

Presently, as far as I can figure from what I have heard during the debate, there will be a surplus of from six to eight million bales of cotton in addition to what is set up here. There will be four hundred to five hundred million bushels of surplus wheat if we have as large a crop as we anticipate compared with the crop of last year. There will be a very large surplus of corn, potatoes, and of many articles of agricultural production. As a result of this, the President has indicated that he intends to ask for $2,000,000,000 additional borrowing power for the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Before we get through with this operation, the losses the country will have to pay—and I pray to God that we will not be bailed out by another war to wipe out the losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation—are going to be so high that, added to the budget estimate the President has submitted to us, the total will be a staggering figure, and our debt will show an increase which will be a burden beyond all possibility of carrying.

I hope that as we come to vote on these things we will realize that, as we extend these authorities, as we increase these probable losses, we are creating such losses that they will break down completely all of these agricultural programs. We are not doing the farmer, for whom we pretend to do these things, a bit of good.

I wish the House, as it approaches a vote upon this measure, would bear in mind where we are heading and what is going to result in the long run from this kind of an approach to the problem. I recognize that there are certain individual injustices that have not been taken care of by the reservations that were made, but those reservations are nothing as compared with the distress we will bring upon the farmer by overloading these programs in such a way as to contribute very largely to the distress that will come from uncontrolled inflation and the inability of our people to meet the situation with which we are confronted.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished neighbor from New York has given us something to think about. The Federal Treasury is not a bottomless pit out of which we can continue to syphon off money to subsidize this, that, or the other part of our economy, without facing a day of reckoning.

We have been hearing a lot about cotton, cotton, and more cotton. It certainly is not neglected nor abused so far as the Economic Cooperation Administration is concerned, nor anywhere else, for that matter. I note, from a recent report from the ECA that, of the $3,622,300,000 spent for food and agricultural products to be sent to the western European countries, nearly 25 percent, or $861,300,000, was spent for cotton. In December last year, ECA spent $174,000,000 for all food and agricultural products, of which $85,000,000, or nearly half, was for cotton.

There has been a lot of talk here about the Commodity Credit Corporation not losing any money on cotton. Of course, that is not the equivalent of saying that the cotton program has not cost the taxpayers any money. It is all a bookkeeping transaction designed to make the cotton story sound plausible. When all this cotton is shipped overseas, the Commodity Credit Corporation is credited with the value of it, which makes the cotton transactions on the books of that agency look profitable, or at least, free from loss.

But let us not fool ourselves by that argument into thinking that the pay envelopes of the workers of this country are not being generously tapped to subsidize the cotton interests. Every time we stimulate the production of cotton and extend the subsidy on it, by legislation like this bill, we increase the temptation and pressure to ship more and more cotton overseas, and for the Government to buy more and more of it for that purpose. The money to do that can come from only one place, and that is the pay envelopes of the workers who pay the taxes in this country.

Like my colleague from New York, I shall vote against this bill and against any other measure brought before us by the Committee on Agriculture, designed to provide hand-outs for one small group of our citizens, like the cotton and peanut farmers here involved, and which will eventually put these very farmers, and others who follow the same Pied Piper, in the strait-jacket of complete regimentation and control.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 398) relating to cotton and peanut acreage allotments and marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, he reported the joint resolution back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the joint resolution?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN moves to recommit House Joint Resolution 398 to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN) there were—ayes 33, noes 71.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question being taken; and there were—yeas 136, nays 239, not voting 57, as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, among the many major concerns of this present session of the Congress is that of effecting economies in government without impairing the efficiency or the services of the several divisions and bureaus. Proper economy is a necessity. The problem then is when and where to cut.

Many of the proposed reductions emanate from the report on the executive branch of Government made by the Hoover Commission. Some of the bills presented to the House based on the recommendations of this Commission have given me a lot of concern and much study of the conditions which the legislation seeks to cure. I am more and more concerned with that part which relates to the Veterans' Administration and the details of administering the vast program which directly affects some 19,000,000 veterans of our American wars and their families.

The legislation proposed, based on the recommendations of the Hoover report, would practically dismember that one agency which now functions as a single center for all veteran matters. Most of us remember the chaos that followed the end of the First World War when the veterans' affairs were scattered out over a half dozen bureaus. It was to cure such a situation that the Veterans' Administration, gathering all matters of compensation, pension, medical and hospital care, insurance, and other interests into a single division under a Director who is directly responsible to the President, was created.

It is proposed to take away from the Veterans' Administration all medical and hospital services, which would be taken over by a new medical bureau called the United Medical Administration, farm out the job of hospital construction to the Department of the Interior, set up an entirely new Veterans' Insurance Corporation to handle the World War I Government life insurance and the World War II national service life, and to put the loan-guaranty program under the GI bill in some subdivision of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

It seems to me that by milking down the Veterans' Administration, stripping it of its vital functions, and scattering its parts to other agencies—two of them brand new—that we are turning the pages backward. The effect, as I see it, would set the veteran right back to the place in the 1920's when he was shunted from bureau to division and back again. And I fail to see how economies can be brought about, or the efficiency improved, by the creation of new bureaus and corporations; conversely, I can see increased cost in personnel, administration, and what not.

I am very strongly of the belief that the improvement in services—and improvements are needed—and savings in costs can best be made within the framework of the existing Veterans' Administration. I do not believe that it is the part of economy or in the interest of veterans as a whole to abandon the Veterans' Administration to a limited program of paying compensation and pensions.

In my opinion, it would be a grave mistake to dismember the Veterans' Administration as presently constituted.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LODGE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. GAMBLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

CHANGE IN COLOR OF CURRENCY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 6 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on August 22, 1947, I asked the Secretary of the Treasury by letter to change the color of our paper money and to have different colors for different denominations, and to change the note currency. I felt that it would greatly facilitate the purchase of tickets, payments in restaurants, and other business transactions, and prevent errors which ticket agents tell me they find in making change for the people buying tickets. The restaurant people have told me the same thing and other salesmen and women and also people in banks.

I also felt, Mr. Speaker, that it would bring into taxation a great deal of bad money, shall I call it, gangster money—money hidden by Communists and other subversive groups that has been in hiding, where the owners at the present time pay no taxes. It would very much relieve the situation today where people are so tremendously taxed, and, as I fear, will be further taxed.

When I was in Boston on Saturday, Boston was very much exercised over the $1,500,000 Brink robbery, and the people told me that if my colored-currency plan could go into effect at once it would be a very simple matter to find the people who stole the money from Brink's.

The Brink robbery took place some weeks ago and it is the talk of the Nation that the robbers have not been found yet. I think my plan has very much merit and I do not believe there is anything against it. I talked with the Treasury Department in August, and prior to that in 1947. And many times since 1947 and the present time. I did not receive an answer from the Treasury Department until November 5. Legislation is not necessary, because, as you will remember, Mr. Mellon in 1929 changed the currency at that time in the matter of size and in other ways. It can be done by executive order by the Secretary of the Treasury. I have talked with the Secretary of the Treasury on numerous occasions. I have talked with Mr. Hall, head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and all those concerned with the change of our currency.

I introduced a bill on November 2, 1948, to provide for the calling in by the Secretary of the Treasury of all outstanding paper and United States currency, in all amounts, for the reissuance of note paper and currency in place thereof in new and different colors for different denominations. I have a bill before the House at the present time. I have asked the Banking and Currency Committee for a hearing. Many benefits will be derived from the issuance of new United States currency and note paper in place of the old currency.

I have the feeling, Mr. Speaker, that there is no very real objection on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury or on the part of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to changing the color of the currency and possibly the size.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is what they did in Russia and Germany and a great many other countries. Does the gentlewoman think we should do what they are doing in Russia?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not think it would be following Russia in the least. It has been done, and done more than once in our own country. It was done in 1929. We were not following Russia then, or in other instances when the size and color of our currency was changed. Recently I have been looking at some of the currency used years ago. There were many sizes and colors. It works very well in Canada and it has worked well in other countries. The gentleman can get no communistic tinge from this. As a matter of fact it would help the United States to find the Communists. In many instances their money is hidden money. This legislation would bring it out of hiding in the United States.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. What color would the gentlewoman have for the new money?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Different colors. It could follow the same system as our United States postage stamps so that it would be easier for those who are making change. It would give them two chances to be correct. I know that one day I gave a $10 bill to a taxi driver for a $1 bill. He wanted to return it to me, but I remonstrated with him and told him to keep it. He had been very kind on many occasions. So I made a mistake. Others have made mistakes in making change.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry to hear that the gentlewoman has made a mistake.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think we all make mistakes. I do not think any of us is perfect except the good Lord.

I earnestly hope that a change will be made in the present color of our currency. It is very important to catch the robbers and the tax evaders. It is very important to bring out all of this money that has been kept in hiding and on which no taxes are being paid, so that we can collect taxes on it. It is very important to give people every opportunity to be accurate in money transactions. I refer the Members of the House to a very clear analysis I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 2, 1948, page 938. Many editorials have been written in approval of my resolution and I have received many approving letters.

REORGANIZATION OF THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, in another speech I would like to speak on the report of the Hoover Commission on the reorganization of the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. Speaker, members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs who listened recently to the statements of the national commanders of the four great veterans' organizations—the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and the AMVETS—were deeply impressed with one salient fact, forcibly emphasized in each commander's statement: The veterans' organizations are irrevocably pledged to a campaign of opposition to the Hoover Commission recommendations as they pertain to the Veterans' Administration.

Never in all of the years I have been working with the various veterans' organizations have I seen such a unanimity of thought, such a joining of hands, as it were, against what these veterans feel is an attempt to socialize veterans' affairs.

Especially vehement was the statement of National Commander George N. Craig, of the American Legion. He said:

> It is because the principal and the entire structure of veterans' services built upon it are in imminent danger of destruction that the American Legion stands side by side with our brother organizations here today.

He emphasized the Legion's interest in and support of any program that would make for real economy in the Government's discharge of the Nation's obligations to its 19,000,000 veterans. The Legion, he stated, realizes that improvements can be achieved in the operations of the present Veterans' Administration, but, he added:

> It believes very strongly that such improvements in services and savings in costs can best be made within the existing framework of the Veterans' Administration.

Commander Craig outlined clearly his organization's objections to the drastic recommendations of the Hoover Commission. He was followed and supported by National Commander Clyde A. Lewis, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who especially scored the Hoover Commission recommendation that all Government medical treatment and hospitalization, including veteran hospitals, be consolidated under a central hospital and medical agency.

National Commander David M. Brown, of the Disabled American Veterans, told our committee that his organization is particularly opposed to those sections of the Hoover report which would destroy the identity and status of veterans, as veterans. He called attention to an "organized and well-financed campaign under way to sell the American people on the adoption of the Hoover reorganization proposal in its entirety. In communities all over this Nation, citizens' committees are urging that the Hoover Commission Report on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Federal Government will bring about efficiency and economy in Government. It is safe to say that many of these people have never read the Hoover Commission report and do not have the slightest conception as to what it contains."

Harold Russell, national commander of the AMVETS, that fast-growing young organization of World War II veterans which this Congress chartered in the Eightieth Congress, endorsed the statements of his colleagues in censuring the Hoover Commission report, and specifically stated that his organization believed "that if this Hoover Commission report were implemented the result would not be economy and efficiency, but additional costs and drastic cuts in service to the veterans."

I hope that every Member of this House of Representatives will take the time to read and study these Hoover Commission recommendations as they pertain to veterans. Most of you will be as shocked and alarmed as I was when the whole picture unfolded before me. To show you just what is contemplated in the way of socialization and disintegration of existing benefits to our war veterans I want to take the time to go over the more important changes suggested in that report.

Let us look first at the Hoover plan for a proposed United Medical Administration. Those of you who have been in Congress for several terms remember the long, arduous fight we made to build up the Veterans' Administration hospital and medical system. Today it is universally hailed by civilian medical leaders as an outstanding medical system. Veterans' Administration hospitals and medical personnel are among the finest in America and thousands of veterans will testify to the excellence of the care and treatment received from these services.

Under the Hoover plan there would be established a United Medical Administration into which would be consolidated most of the large-scale activities of the Government in the fields of medical care, medical research, and public health. The proposal would limit the use by veterans of the Nation's hospital plant established for them by making these facilities available to additional groups, principally armed-forces personnel and their dependents, and merchant seamen.

I ask you to recall the confusion, the wastefulness, and the suffering experienced by our veterans when the activities which are now the function of the Veterans' Administration were scattered throughout different departments of our Government. The compensation and insurance programs were administered by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance of the Treasury Department, the vocational rehabilitation of the war-service disabled was administered by the Federal Board of Vocational Education, and the medical and hospital care of the service disabled was the responsibility of the United States Public Health Service. It was a serious situation. Veterans found it difficult to obtain the prompt and sympathetic treatment which the Congress and the country intended they should receive. In April 1921 the President appointed an impartial committee to make an investigation of the administration of these laws. The committee recommended the creation of a single agency to care for veterans and their problems. The report of this committee, ably headed by the Honorable Charles G. Dawes, later Vice President, is so pertinent, so applicable at this time, when it is proposed to return to the old order, as to justify the inclusion here of its two concluding paragraphs:

> It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the present deplorable failure on the part of the Government to properly care for the disabled veterans is due in large part to an imperfect organization of governmental effort. There is no one in control of the whole situation. Independent agencies, by mutual agreement, now endeavor to coordinate their action, but in such efforts the joint action is too often modified by minor consideration, and there is always lacking that complete cooperation which is incident to a powerful superimposed authority. No emergency of war itself was greater than is the emergency which confronts the Nation in its duty to care for those disabled in its service and now neglected.
> The summoning of this committee by you is an earnest to the country that you are convinced of the vital nature of this problem and that you are determined to secure a prompt and effective solution thereof. The man to whom this important mission is entrusted by you will receive in the performance of his arduous duties the wholehearted and enthusiastic support and cooperation of all veterans and all other patriotic Americans. No Cabinet officer or assistant secretary burdened with other duties should be the one to whom the man charged with the welfare of the disabled saviors of our country should report. He should report directly to the President. His place should be held in the public esteem as one of the greatest honors that the President can bestow, as the service he can render should be of untold value to the Nation.

Congress then enacted Public Law No. 47, Sixty-seventh Congress, approved August 9, 1921, which established an independent bureau under the President to be known as the Veterans' Bureau. At a later date, in 1930, Congress went further and created what is now known as the Veterans' Administration, bringing under its jurisdiction the Pension Bureau, the National Home for Volunteer Soldiers, and the Veterans' Bureau as a single agency.

That is the structure the Hoover Commission recommends be disintegrated and scattered, under the guise of efficiency and economy. It needs no stretch of the imagination to visualize the effect of such a move. The policy of charging the administration of veterans' benefits to a single agency is the best method for attaining efficiency and economy. Picture, if you will, the tremendous duplication of the records of each individual veteran that would be necessary under the new order so that complete consideration might be given to each type of claim. Perhaps this is best expressed in a paragraph from the report of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to the President's Advisory Committee on Management Improvement, on January 17, 1950. General Gray wrote:

> Many practical reasons exist to support the conclusion that the present integrated system of operation under a single agency is the best method for attaining efficiency and economy in the administration of veterans' programs. For example, it has been found necessary in the administration of various types of benefits to associate the records of each individual veteran so that complete consideration may be given to each type of claim, thus insuring greater protection to the Government as well as the claimant in testing the accuracy and sufficiency of proof in connection with claims for more than one benefit. These records also contain certain information which may be needed to determine entitlement to several benefits provided by law. It is not possible to determine in advance for what purpose certain information may be needed at some future time, and, accordingly, it is necessary that all evidence in each individual folder be retained for possible future use. Separation of the benefit programs for veterans would require the submission by claimants of duplicate items of evidence to each separate agency. Moreover, a tremendous volume of day-to-day reference between the independent agencies would be required.

That, ladies and gentlemen, is the picture as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs paints it if the Hoover Commission recommendations are carried out.

Let us return for a moment to that phase of the Hoover plan that deals with hospitals and medical care. In 1946, Congress established by law, in the Veterans' Administration a Department of Medicine and Surgery whose functions are "those necessary for a complete medical and hospital service to be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs pursuant to law, for the medical care and treatment of veterans."

This separate set-up constitutes the most forward step made by the medical branch of the Veterans' Administration in its history. It enabled the Department of Medicine and Surgery to attract into its career service the highest type of men and women to meet its responsibilities. At the present time there are about 115,000 employees engaged in the medical and hospital program. In this Eighty-first Congress we passed a law which raised the salaries of these medical employees in order that the department might meet the competition offered by outside practice in other Federal services. Now the individual doctors, dentists, and nurses consider their association with the Department of Medicine and Surgery as something to look at with pride. That is the status we want continued.

The Hoover Commission report also recommends the transfer to a proposed Building Construction Service in the Department of the Interior of the responsibility for the preparation of plans, award of contracts, and supervision of major construction projects, including Veterans' Administration hospitals. Just prior to World War II the Veterans' Administration, in collaboration with the Federal Board of Hospitalization, developed a construction program designed to meet the World War I peak load of veterans' hospitalization. Before this program could be completed World War II began, and while some beds were added through new construction, no large construction programs were undertaken due to the difficulty in obtaining materials that were urgently needed in the war effort. The Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 authorized and directed the Administrator and the Federal Board of Hospitalization to complete the construction of additional hospital facilities for war veterans. A study of the existing situation was made, and as a result there were developed and the President approved construction and expansion programs which would have provided an additional 55,106 beds.

In January 1949, the President in his budget message directed that the program he had previously authorized be curtailed by approximately 16,000 beds. In order to effect this, he approved the cancellation of 24 hospital projects and the reduction in planned capacity of 14 additional hospitals. The rescission in contract authorizations by reason of this reduction amounted to $237,000,000. Congress, however, has repeatedly refused to approve this reduction in hospital construction and the contract authorization of $237,000,000 has been reinstated in the appropriation bills. Further than this, we have now a bill pending upon the calendars of the House that directs the construction of these 16,000 bed facilities. Under the Hoover plan the proposal to turn over the responsibility for Veterans' Administration hospital construction the Department of the Interior would divorce the close working relationship between those who construct and those who design to meet medical requirements as well as those who are responsible for maintenance and betterments, a relationship that exists to a high degree in the Veterans' Administration at the present time. For many years past the Veterans' Administration has developed a group of highly qualified architect-engineers who have, by long experience and intimate knowledge of the program, become expert in the care of veteran patients. This smooth-working organization would be broken up and discarded under the Hoover recommendation.

Still another recommendation of the Hoover Commission, and one which has drawn severe criticism from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, is the proposal to create a Veterans' Life Insurance Corporation. In the opinion of the Administrator such a change would not add any impetus to better service to policyholders or economy in operation. General Gray has pointed out his grave doubts as to the legality of such a move as it would be a breach of faith with policyholders as well as a breach of contract which the Supreme Court on the principle of Lynch v. United States (292 U. S. 571), would hold to be beyond the power of Congress. Even if the plan were limited to future insurance with a separate fund therefor it would be contrary to the policy of the Government of defraying extra-hazard and administrative costs through appropriation.

Aside from all that, it is my own conviction that the creation of a Veterans' Life Insurance Corporation would not only disrupt an existing organization that is just beginning to function efficiently after one of the most trying periods of its existence, but it would create another huge bureaucratic agency the cost of which would grow and grow and grow. Our Committee on Veterans' Affairs had made a complete and comprehensive study of the Insurance Division of the Veterans' Administration and has in preparation a number of measures aimed at the development of more efficiency and at greater economy of operation. Some idea of the size of this Insurance Division can be gained when it is noted that at the present time over 7,500,000 insurance policies are in force, representing a value of about $42,000,000,000. Surely this is a most lucrative and luscious plum to dangle before the eyes of those who would expand the bureaucratic scope of our Government. It is not difficult to foresee the results of such a move.

Another recommendation involves the transfer of the loan guaranty activities of the Veterans' Administration under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Why such a change should be made is difficult to see, for there seems to be no sound reason for it. The veterans' loan program is designed to give preferential treatment to veterans. What better agency to accomplish this can there be than one primarily interested in the welfare of veterans? The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has recommended against the adoption of the proposal.

Besides the three major recommendations of the Hoover Commission discussed above, there are three others which involve certain structural changes in the Veterans' Administration.

Three of these six recommendations will require legislation. The most controversial of these—the one that proposes to merge the medical activities of the Veterans' Administration into a United Medical Administration, which would contain most of the present medical activities and facilities of the Federal Government—is contained in H. R. 5182, now pending before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, while its companion bill—S. 2008—is pending before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Pending before our Committee on Veterans' Affairs are two measures—H. R. 5171 and H. R. 5288—which would create the Veterans' Insurance Corporation. No action has been taken on either of the latter bills and none is scheduled. It is assumed that legislation will be introduced at the request of the President to carry out the recommendations involving the transfer of the loan-guaranty activities. Such a bill would be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The other three recommendations for certain structural changes in the Veterans' Administration would not require legislation and can be made within the judgment and discretion of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs or by decision of the President.

To impress upon your minds the magnitude and importance of this vast department of service to our veterans, which the Hoover Commission would break up and scatter throughout other agencies of our Federal Government, I want to quote from General Gray's report to the President's Advisory Committee on Management Improvement on that phase of the matter. It follows:

The Veterans' Administration administers some 300 laws potentially providing benefits for about 19,000,000 living veterans, as well as dependents of deceased veterans. The great majority of these veterans are former members of the military and naval forces who served in time of war. The benefits afforded include disability compensation, pensions, vocational rehabilitation, and education; the guaranty of loans for the purchase or construction of homes, farms, and business property; readjustment allowances for veterans who are unemployed; national service and United States Government life insurance; death and burial benefits; adjusted compensation; emergency officers' retirement pay; hospital and out-patient treatment and domiciliary care. The Veterans' Administration also administers the insurance article of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940, as amended, for persons in the active military service.

The Veterans' Administration now operates 133 hospitals and domiciliary centers. In addition, it has 12,000 beds under contract in non-Veterans' Administration hospitals. With these facilities, it provides medical care for a daily average of 107,000 veteran patients. Its program for the construction of a total of 67 new hospitals, together with the closing of semipermanent hospitals taken over from the military will adjust the total capacity to approximately 131,000 permanent beds.

It provides out-patient medical and dental care for more than 2,500,000 veterans annually. Treatments total approximately 6,000,000 a year. In addition, approximately 7,400,000 physical and dental examinations are completed annually.

It makes monthly compensation and pension payments to 2,300,000 living veterans and to the dependents of 645,000 deceased veterans.

It pays for the education and training of 2,500,000 veterans, including the payment of subsistence allowances totaling approximately $2,123,000,000 annually.

It has 7,500,000 life-insurance policies in force, with a total face value of $42,000,000,000.

It has guaranteed approximately 1,800,000 home, farm, and business loans for veterans.

It has as wards 245,000 incompetent veterans, minors, and other incompetents, whose estates have an estimated value of $260,000,000.

It certifies more than 6,700,000 checks each month.

It receives 170,000,000 pieces of mail annually.

It maintains over 190,000,000 administrative and veterans' records.

It operates 13 district offices, 70 regional offices and 498 other field offices to bring its services to veterans and their dependents.

It has a working force of 185,500 full-time employees and part-time personnel equivalent to an additional 5,100 full-time employees; 116,000 of the full-time personnel and substantially all of the part-time employees are engaged in providing medical, hospital, and domiciliary care for veterans.

In several respects, the Veterans' Administration differs from other Federal agencies. One significant attribute is the fact that the head of the Veterans' Administration is vested with broad authority to organize and reorganize the agency in accordance with such changes as may be indicated by experience, and to adopt and alter methods of operation for the purpose of achieving maximum efficiency in rendering service to veterans. This centralization of responsibility and control is a natural outgrowth of unsatisfactory experience by the Government with the previous division of responsibility for veterans' benefits among different agencies, and it likewise eliminates the difficulties which flow from a plan of organization by which bureau chiefs within an agency enjoy a degree of power preventing the head of the agency from carrying out a consistent over-all policy.

Another distinctive attribute of the Veterans' Administration is the fact that it is engaged, exclusively, in providing services for a definite class or segment of our population. Moreover, the benefits thus provided are manysided and consist of a variety of programs with independent characteristics. * * * The plan of organization of the Veterans' Administration is likewise different from that of other agencies in that it consists largely of an integrated field operation distributed on a geographical basis, designed to provide veterans' benefits directly at the local level.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I am very much opposed to the report of the Hoover Commission. I think it was prepared largely by persons who knew nothing about the structure of the Veterans' Administration and little, if anything, about veterans' affairs. I remember very well when the consolidation took place, when war risk was in one place and the Medical Section was under Public Health, and other divisions were in other departments. There was chaos; they did not have the files; they could not coordinate the care of the veterans or rehabilitation of the veterans with the medical services; they could not do any of the things that they ought to do as a unit for the veterans.

Then there was the Medical Service. Great effort was made to have a fine Medical Service, to establish it on such basis that it could be a career for doctors who went into it, to have it of a character to induce them to go into the service. I believe I can safely say today that the Veterans' Medical Service is the finest in the country, the finest in the world. They have very fine doctors, and nurses, and consultants, and specialists. They have very fine hospitals.

Then there was the building program. Under the Hoover Commission recommendations, the building would be transferred to the Interior Department. They made no provision for special building for the veterans. And another thing, in the President's message, Mr. Speaker, the President said that all the nonservice veterans would get their benefits under the general welfare program. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you know that many of the non-service-connected veterans are having careful examinations in hospitals and out of hospitals and often, very often, they become service-connected from a non-service-connected status. It would be manifestly unfair to put the veterans in hospitals with the civilians. In the matter of hospitals, the civilians and men even in prisons would compete with our veterans for beds.

I am wholeheartedly opposed to their report on the veterans, and I understand that the Hoover Commission has made no effort to press it. It looks as if the report never even got action in a committee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has again expired.

THE HISS CASE

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBER], appearing in the RECORD of yesterday, on page 1095, is typical of the desperate attempt administration forces are making to hide the facts of treachery and espionage rampant among President Truman's bureaucracy.

Let me ask this question. If it had not been for the Un-American Activities Committee of the Eightieth Congress, and my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. NIXON] especially, would Hiss have ever been prosecuted? The answer is "No." Any person with common sense knows that this committee, operating under threats of reprisal and red-herring propaganda, literally forced prosecution of Alger Hiss. Further than that, President Truman and the Department of Justice had access to the facts of the Hiss treachery within their knowledge and control and could have prosecuted him on actual charges of sedition or espionage over 10 years ago if they had wanted to.

No, Mr. HUBER, the administration you are trying to defend must take sole responsibility for these New Deal chickens now coming home to roost—and what a sorry-looking mess of birds they are.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN TAXES RELATING TO OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 1, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1172. A letter from the Chairman, Munitions Board, transmitting the semiannual report to the Congress on the stock-piling program; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1173. A letter from the Chairman, District of Columbia Armory Board, transmitting the second annual report of the District of Columbia Armory Board, pursuant to section 10, Public Law 605 of June 4, 1948; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

American Pulpwood Association,[1] 220 East Forty-second Street, New York, N. Y. (1) The association is a voluntary unincorporated association, not for profit, and is composed of producers, suppliers, and consumers of pulpwood within the United States. Its principal objective is the promotion of the welfare of the industry at large and protection of its interests. It is principally concerned with improved logging, production, and transportation methods, conservation of resources, betterment of operations, safety and fire-prevention programs, development of mechanical equipment and other problems peculiar to the industry which it represents. Its only concern with legislation or legislative action of any character arises when some legislative proposal is made which appears to have some direct effect upon the industry, its members, or their business and operations. Such occasions rarely arise but when they do the association acts by itself and is not, therefore, employed by anyone in the ordinary sense of that word. (2) The association works solely in the interest of the pulpwood industry in the United States as represented by its membership. (3) As above stated, the association is employed by no one. Such legislative activities as it may undertake will presumably be continued, when and as the need therefor is apparent, as long as the association's organization continues to exist. (4) The revenue of the association is derived entirely from dues and assessments collected from its members. It is not conducted for profit and no part of its income inures to the benefit of any member. Its funds are used exclusively for the objectives above described, only a small portion being allocated from time to time for legislative activities as the actual necessities of each individual problem may require. No specific contributions are received for such purposes nor any specific appropriations made therefor, all such expenses being charged, as made, against the general funds of the association. (5) See answer to item 4. (6) See answer to item 4. (7) The expenses paid or incurred by the association in legislative activities consist generally of that proportion of its secretary's compensation of $13,000 annually as the time devoted by him to such activities bears to his total working time, together with the out-of-pocket expenses of the secretary in such activities. There are also the expenses of holding meetings from time to time and the rarely occasional publication and distribution of educational and informative literature. There may be other expenditures of an unusual or emergent character which are not possible of general classification.

Dow, Fayette B., Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.; Committee for Pipe Line Companies, Box 1349, Tulsa, Okla. (1) The Committee for Pipe Line Companies was organized to represent, as occasion may arise, in Washington, before departments of the Government, including Congress, the petroleum pipe lines that are regulated by Interstate Commerce Commission under the Interstate Commerce Act. The committee is not proposing or advocating any changes in existing laws. Deponent believes that in the period covered by this quarterly report he has taken no action that comes within the provisions of the Lobbying Act. Deponent believes that of his total compensation for all services rendered to the Committee for Pipe Line Companies $500 would be a fair apportionment for any services which might be considered to be within the provisions of the Lobbying Act. In the quarter ending December 31, 1949, deponent received $27.43 reimbursement for August and September 1949, expenses covering postage, telephone, and miscellaneous items. None of the foregoing items deponent believes relate to activities within the scope of the Lobbying Act. (2) See (1). (3) See (1) above. (4) None. (5) No legislation is proposed by Committee for Pipe Line Companies, deponent's employer. The committee is opposed to S. 571 which would make it unlawful for oil companies to own and operate pipe lines.

Stockton, Kenneth E., American Cable & Radio Corp., 67 Broad Street, New York, N. Y. (1) I have been associated with International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. in varicus capacities for many years and have been president of its subsidiary, American Cable & Radio Corp., for the past year and a half. This company has been negotiating with Western Union Telegraph Co. for the purchase of the latter company's cables, which negotiations have reached the point of necessitating several governmental approvals and possibly congressional action. Activities in the foregoing connection and with reference to possible merger legislation necessarily require my contact with Members of Congress and other Government officials. However, this is an incidental function under my duties for which I receive no additional remuneration above my regular salary. Neither have I made nor do I intend to make any contributions for the purposes designated in paragraph 307. It is not the principal purpose of my employment to influence legislation, nor do I receive my compensation principally for the purose of influencing legislation. The above-mentioned activities would not seem to come within the purview of the Lobbying Act; however, I have no objection to filing under the same and will furnish any further information if desired. My salary is as heretofore reported, no part of which is specifically for the purpose of influencing legislation. (2) See (1). (3) See (1). (4) None. (5) I have not been employed to support or oppose any particular legislation, but as president of the American Cable & Radio Corp., I favor and will urge the enactment of appropriate legislation which will permit my company or its subsidiaries to purchase Western Union cables under authority of an amendment to section 222 (c) (2) of the Communications Act.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, midst thronging duties and confused issues, in the quiet of this moment of prayer we would make our souls the sanctuary of Thy spirit. Make plain to our understanding that our legislative enactments and our economic adjustments in themselves cannot bring social salvation, except as they clear the way for that spiritual strength without which we labor in vain, without which all else is as futile props against a decaying house that the Lord hath not made. Make us alive and alert to the spiritual values which underlie all the struggle of these epic days as on the anvil of vast issues there slowly takes shape the new and better world that is to be. In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. HILL, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 31, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting a nomination was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is absent on public business.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is absent by leave of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

FREER TRADE AND CURRENCY CONVERTIBILITY IN EUROPE

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds to make a statement about ECA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Virginia is recognized for 30 seconds.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, a very important and vital meeting of OEEC is now in progress in Paris. ECA is represented there by Mr. Paul Hoffman, who is urging the members of OEEC to adopt a plan for freer trade and for currency convertibility. In my opinion the plan for freer trade has encountered great difficulties, and I am not hopeful for its success. The plan for currency convertibility does not appeal to Great Britain because of her obligations to the sterling-area countries. But a plan for currency convertibility on the continent of Europe is practical, and, in my opinion, is very essential. So I wish to state that, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I should be glad to vote to earmark a portion of our future ECA aid to help support what might be termed a continental currency clearing union to facilitate trade among those nations of western Europe which we are endeavoring to rehabilitate. I frankly express the fear that unless some plan to lighten the burden of present trade restrictions can soon be worked out our tremendous expenditures for the rehabilitation of western Europe will end in failure.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting, pursuant to law, his annual report, including the reports of the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, for the fiscal year 1949 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

If there be no objection, the Chair will ask that the communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution adopted by the Puerto Rican United Independent Sugar Cane Colonos of Camuy, Hatillo, Quebradillas and Isabela, of Camuy, P. R., relating to the sugar industry in Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The petition of Bernice Wallus, of Hartford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to extend the provisions of the social-security law; to the Committee on Finance.

The petition of Almo Seaton, of Independence, Mo., praying for the enactment of the so-called Townsend plan, providing old-age insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by Maj. James A. McKenna, Jr., Post, No. 199, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the enactment of House bill 4617, to liberalize the requirement for payment of pension in certain cases to veterans and their widows and children; to the Committee on Finance.

The petition of Edwin C. M. Dickey, a citizen of the United States, relating to his case, No. 197 MSC, now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A resolution adopted by the Worcester (Mass.) District Dental Society, protesting against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The memorial of Mrs. Ernest Dorr, of Gladwin, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1103 and House bill 2945, to readjust postal rates; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

A resolution adopted by owners and active farmers, and other interested citizens of the United States, assembled at Clarksville, Tenn., favoring the enactment of legislation to effectuate the plans of the Corps of Engineers for the development of the Cumberland River; to the Committee on Public Works.

A resolution adopted by the Executive Board of the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, of Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring the enactment of legislation to liberalize the displaced-persons law, etc.; ordered to lie on the table.

THE SOCIALIZED STATE—RESOLUTION BY AMERICAN NATIONAL LIVESTOCK ASSOCIATION

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a special resolution recently adopted at the American National Livestock Association Convention at Miami, Fla., relating to the socialized state, and I request that the resolution be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There impends today a threat to our country and the freedom of its citizens which so menacingly overshadows the future that we, American cattlemen of all shades of political belief, feel it our duty to speak out in unmistakable terms.

This threat lies in the fact that our country—without conscious choice on the part of its people—is rapidly and unmistakably drifting toward the consummation of a false concept—the socialized state.

Tokens of this danger are everywhere and undeniable. The growing power and expansion of wasteful government; the colossal public debt; the heavy burden of taxation; the malicious attempt to substitute an artificial economy for the natural economy which alone can function in freedom; the gradual assumption by the State of financial responsibility for every hazard incident to life—hazards which should be personally met and borne by every human being who has the instinctive will to survive and the inherent impulse to be free; the arraignment of economic and social groups, one against the other; and numerous other conditions and proposals similarly inspired and equally false.

Government produces nothing and has no means by which to support these false and destructive theories except by exacting from its citizens the fruits of their labors.

The course the Government is now taking, unless it is promptly reversed, must inevitably lead to national bankruptcy. In a vain effort to prolong a specious sense of security, more similar expedients will be applied until we become mere numbers in a completely socialized state: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the American National Livestock Association in convention assembled at Miami, Fla., January 5, 1950, reaffirm our solemn conviction that the future health, strength, and prosperity of our country depends on the reestablishment and maintenance of free and competitive enterprise and hereby pledge ourselves as individuals and as an association to diligently and actively work toward this objective and toward the defeat of the falacious philosophies that are beguiling our country into socialism.

CLEAR RADIO CHANNEL FOR MARKET INFORMATION AND REPORTS

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, resolutions adopted by the Texas Sheep and Goat Raisers Association, at its annual meeting in November, 1949, and the National Wool Growers Association, at Denver, Colo., relating to clear radio channels for market information and reports, in rural areas.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

CLEAR-CHANNEL RESOLUTION OF THE TEXAS SHEEP AND GOAT RAISERS ASSOCIATION

We reiterate our previous stand in favor of clear channel broadcasting stations and higher power on clear channels for adequate service to rural areas; and we furthermore request that the State Department be instructed by the proper authority to maintain a firm position to protect the rights, radiowise, of the United States against further inroads by other North American countries.

CLEAR-CHANNEL RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL WOOL GROWERS ASSOCIATION

The radio furnishes an important source of needed information to the ranchers, supplying them with market information and reports, weather reports, and other helpful news.

It has come to our attention that there is a move under way to break down clear-channel high-power stations which serve rural areas, we are reliably informed the State Department is discussing treaties with Cuba, Mexico, and possibly other countries which might result in the surrender of vital clear channels.

We favor the retention of clear-channel high-power broadcasting stations. We insist the State Department be instructed to maintain a firm position to protect the radio rights of the people of the United States.

DEFENSE OF FORMOSA—RESOLUTION OF MILITARY ORDER OF WORLD WARS, WISCONSIN CHAPTER

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hand a fine letter received from a dear friend and distinguished attorney of Wisconsin, Mr. Saul O. Arnold. Mr. Arnold's letter reports that the local chapter of the Military Order of the World Wars on Thursday night, January 26, adopted a resolution dealing with the critical Formosa problem. I believe that the text of the resolution will be of interest to my colleagues because they appreciate as do I the fact that America has suffered a staggering reversal in the Far East and the time is long overdue for decisive steps there on the part of United States foreign policy.

I have previously commented on the Senate floor the importance of getting the judgment of such great military leaders on the scene as Gen. Douglas MacArthur who, according to all reports, has recommended a far more vigorous program for defense of the Far East than the State Department has thus far approved.

The suggestion made by former President Hoover and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] relative to the defense of Formosa is one which has stimulated the thinking of our entire American people on this question. I personally believe and have so stated that military experts should long ago have been sent to Formosa to consult with the Chinese Nationalist Government at the very minimum. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution as sent to me by Mr. Arnold be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas each member of the Military Order of the World Wars has assumed the obligation to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom and democracy for God and country; and

Whereas the principles of communism are at war with the principles of the Military Order of the World Wars, as laid down in the preamble to its constitution; and

Whereas the principles of communism are atheistic and antagonistic to all established religions; and

Whereas no country in the world today is under the domination and control of Communist Russia, except through treachery, deception, armed revolution and bloodshed; and

Whereas the citizens of countries under the domination and control of Communist Russia are deprived of the right of religious freedom and the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and

Whereas the Communists are now in control of China; and

Whereas there is grave danger of Formosa becoming dominated and controlled by the Communists; and

Whereas the fall of Formosa to the Communists would imperil the security of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Government of the United States promptly fortify the island of Formosa and occupy said island with American troops and take such other steps as may be necessary in order to prevent Formosa from being captured by the Communists; be it further

Resolved, That former President Hoover and the Senators and Congressmen who have advocated the immediate defense of Formosa be commended for their forthright and courageous position.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KNOWLAND:

S. 2959. A bill for the relief of Nicolas Drujinenko-Nicolaie; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMAS of Utah (by request):

S. 2930. A bill to remove certain inequities by fixing the hours of work and overtime-compensation practices in the case of certain employees of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(Mr. MALONE introduced Senate bill 2961, for the relief of Magdalena L. Jardeleza, Jr., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LEHMAN:

S. 2932. A bill for the relief of Dr. Adolf Prochazka and his daughter, Helena Prochazkova; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

S. 2963. A bill to authorize the reimbursement of certain naval attachés, observers, and other officers for certain expenses incurred while on authorized missions in foreign countries; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 2964. A bill to amend the Natural Gas Act so as to exempt from the provisions thereof natural-gas companies all of whose operations are conducted within the same State; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2965. A bill for the relief of George Pantelas;

S. 2966. A bill for the relief of Heinrich Karl Stade; and

S. 2967. A bill for the relief of Henricus F. J. Sleddens, his wife, Elizabeth, and his daughter, Sylvester; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PEPPER:

S. 2963. A bill for the relief of Chen Hua Huang; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCLELLAN:

S. 2969. A bill to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Department of Commerce; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

MAGDALENA L. JARDELEZA, JR.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill for the relief of Magdalena L. Jardeleza, Jr., whose mother, Artiemichie Magadena Jardeleza, is an American citizen, and whose father, Magdalena L. Jardeleza an alien. The son entered the United States September 2, 1945, as soon as hostilities were over. When he reached the age of 21 it was his prerogative to declare whether he wanted to be a United States citizen or a Filipino citizen. However, the war was still on and it was a physical impossibility for him to come to the United States. Mr. Jardeleza is a law student at George Washington University, and even though he is over 21 years of age, his only means of support are his parents. It would be a financial burden on his parents to support him in school anywhere away from home.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2961) for the relief of Magdalena L. Jardeleza, Jr., was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is authorized and directed to discontinue any deportation proceedings and to cancel any outstanding order and warrant of deportation, warrant of arrest, and bond, which may have been issued in the case of Magdalena L. Jardeleza, Jr., of Washington, D. C. From and after the date of enactment of this act, the said Magdalena L. Jardeleza, Jr., shall not again be subject to deportation by reason of the same facts upon which such deportation proceedings were commenced or any such warrants and order have issued.

SEC. 2. In the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws, the said Magdalena L. Jardeleza, Jr., shall be considered as having been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of his last entry into the United States, upon payment of the required head tax and visa fee.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the first available immigration quota for nationals of the Republic of the Philippines.

VISIT BY SENATOR JOHNSON OF COLORADO TO PANAMA CANAL ZONE—EDITORIAL FROM THE STAR OF PANAMA

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, last month the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], visited the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone generally in connection with certain legislative proposals pending in the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. During that visit, the Senator from Colorado had occasion to meet with various officials of the Panamanian Government as well as prominent businessmen. The Senator from Colorado was interviewed by the local press during the course of which he emphasized the mutuality of economic and political interests of Panama and the United States.

Shortly after the Senator from Colorado left Panama, there appeared in the oldest and most respected of Panamanian newspapers, the Star of Panama, a very interesting editorial with respect to the Senator's visit. Because I believe that this editorial will be of great interest to Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the body of the RECORD, both in its original Spanish as well as in an English translation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the body of the RECORD, in its original Spanish and in English translation, as follows:

[From La Estrella de Panama, 19 de Enero de 1950]

VISITA CONSTRUCTIVA

El Senador norteamericano, EDWIN C. JOHNSON, ha sintetizado su análisis de la situación nacional en una declaración que recalca cuatro puntos esenciales: estabilidad política, transportes, comunicaciones y nuevas industrias.

Como prólongo ha dejado establecido el Senador EDWIN C. JOHNSON y nos parece oportuno dejar constancia de ello, mejores relaciones con Panamá, "ya que nosotros las necesitamos tanto como ustedes las necesitan". Es atinado esto. A Panamá le interesan, le han de preocupar en cada instante, las buenas relaciones con los Estados Unidos. Pero igualmente, en la misma proporción, ha de interesar y preocupar a los Estados Unidos la cordialidad de esas relaciones con Panamá. Si conveniente es para Panamá tal estado de comprensión, conveniente resulta para los Estados Unidos.

El primer punto para la autenticidad del entendimiento entre los dos países lo fundamenta el Senador JOHNSON en la estabilidad política. Confiesa el caballero que las noticias publicadas en su país le habían creado un prejuicio: la no existencia de esa estabilidad política en Panamá. Pero he rectificado plenamente: "la estabilidad política existe. Puede asegurar enfáticamente y en forma de convencido que Panamá disfruta de una estabilidad política firme".

He aquí un hecho concreto y trascendental que cristaliza en las palabras del Senador.

El segundo punto que le parece indispensable al Sr. JOHNSON para el progreso de Panamá, para sus buenas relaciones con Estados Unidos, es un mejor sistema de transportes. Mejores carreteras y mas amplio el sistema de carreteras. Advierte este buen amigo de Panamá que hay en el Istmo varios caminos buenos, muy buenos, pero se necesitan muchos más. Como complemento del sistema de transportes mencionó el Sr. JOHNSON mejores comunicaciones de todo orden. Por último indicó la urgencia de crear buenas industrias en esta tierra. Piensa el amable norteamericano que la industria debe ocupar el puesto principal en el sistema económico de Panamá.

Es sugestivo y alentador lo dicho por el Senador EDWIN C. JOHNSON. Piensa que el porvenir de Panamá es brillante y apoya su idea en la valiosa posición que nos ofrece el destino, así como en el ansia de mejoramiento que pudo apreciar en los panameños.

No se trata en este caso de la intromisión de un personaje extranjero en la política o en el desarrollo de otro pueblo. El Senador JOHNSON, buen amigo de Panamá, no ha incurrido en lo que la ciencia política califica de intervención. Lo que nuestro ilustre huésped ha ofrecido es sencillamente una opinion abierta, sincera, noble, en torno a lo que significa Panamá y lo que puede constituir su progreso. Sabidos es que todo buen amigo tiene el deber de hablar con franqueza a su vecino más próximo. Que se hable de lo que se ve, que se juzgue, cimentando en hechos el juicio, lo que en Panamá ocurre, no traduce intervensión en los asuntos propios. El consejo leal, la palabra afectuosa, constituyen guiás, constituyen demostración de buena voluntad, constituyen sincera y humana preocupación.

Por eso nos place lo que ha expresado el Senador EDWIN C. JOHNSON y nos parece oportuno depar constancia de ello.

A CONSTRUCTIVE VISIT

The North American Senator, EDWIN C. JOHNSON, has synthesized his analysis of the national situation in a statement which stresses four essential points—political stability, transportation, communications, and new industries.

As a prologue Senator JOHNSON has established better relations with Panama and it seems opportune to us to carry out this idea, "since we need them as much as they need them." This is absolutely right. Panama is interested and is preoccupied every instant in maintaining good relations with the United States, but in the same way the United States must be interested and preoccupied in cordial relations with Panama. If it is helpful for Panama to have such a state of understanding, it will also result helpful for the United States.

The first point for the complete understanding between these two countries, Senator JOHNSON stresses, is political stability. The gentleman confesses that publicity in his country had given him the prejudiced idea of the nonexistence of political stability in Panama. But he has corrected this erroneous impression greatly—"political stability exists."

This is an intuitive and definite act crystallized in the words of the Senator.

The second point that seems necessary to Senator JOHNSON for the progress of Panama and its friendly relations with the United States is a better transportation system. Better highways and additional highway systems are needed. This good friend of Panama says that there are on the island several good roads, very good—but that more are needed to complete the transportation system. Senator JOHNSON mentions better communications of all kinds. Finally he indicated the need for creating good industries in this country. This amiable North American believes that industry should occupy the first place in the economic life of Panama.

What Senator JOHNSON has said is courageous and helpful. He thinks that the future of Panama is brilliant and he bases this prediction on the valuable geographic position in which fate has placed this country, and he bases it also on the desire for betterment which he could appreciate in every Panamanian.

We are not here speaking of the meddling of a foreigner in the politics or development of another country. Senator JOHNSON, good friend of Panama, has not ventured into what political science calls "intervention." What our illustrious guest has offered is simply a frank opinion—sincere—noble—as to what Panama signifies and in what ways she may progress. It is well known that all good neighbors have the right to speak with frankness to their nearest neighbors, to speak of what they see. To judge what is happening in Panama by carefully selected deeds is not intervention in our affairs. Legal advice, kind words are guide posts. They demonstrate good will, and sincere and human concern.

REDUCTION OF 20-PERCENT WARTIME TAX ON THEATER ADMISSIONS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by me relative to the reduction of the 20-percent wartime tax on theater admissions.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared on the subject of reduction of the 20-percent wartime tax rate on theater admissions. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this statement be printed at this point in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

GIVE THE AX TO THE NUISANCE TAX ON THEATER ADMISSIONS

Mr. President, ever since the end of the war we have been faced with this question: When would Congress meet head-on the problem of the obsolete wartime rates on excise taxes? When would it give the ax to the nuisance tax? We made a promise to the American people that when the war was over, we would indeed reduce the wartime rates. Too often, the promise of the American Government has been broken to our people and I, for one, feel that there is such a thing as keeping one's promise and maintaining the integrity of Uncle Sam.

WILEY TAX-REPEAL BILL

'Way back in February 1949, I introduced a comprehensive excise-tax-repeal-bill, paralleling that introduced by the distinguished leader of the House minority, the Honorable JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., of Massachusetts. This bill proposed a reduction in the wartime rates on theater admissions, furs, jewelry, dues, cosmetics, baby lotions, photo equipment, electric-light bulbs, etc.

For one solid year, the Democratic majority in the Congress has sat on this proposal for reduced excise taxes. The Democratic majority has piously pleaded that "the Government's financial situation would not permit these taxes to be cut." At the very same time, however, these very members of the Democratic majority contradicted themselves by bringing forward suggestions to expend additional billions of dollars in socialized medicine and other dangerous experiments.

The pattern is clear. The more Congress spends money, the more difficult it will be, if not impossible, to attempt to reduce excise and other taxes.

PRESIDENT OMITTED THEATER TAX REDUCTION

Now with the start of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, President Truman has at last gotten on the tax-cut bandwagon and has urged repeal of some of the nuisance taxes. He omitted, however, theater taxes and other taxes from his list of levies to be reduced. At the same time he coupled his suggestion with a plea he knew Congress would definitely not fulfill, a plea for increased taxes in other categories. The President announced he would veto any excise tax repeal bill unless it simultaneously provided for an additional billion dollars in corporation, estate, gift, and other taxes.

Now Mr. President, we have a right to ask the Democratic majority in the Senate and House, "Whom do you think you're kidding? Do you really want these excise taxes repealed? Or is it a phony offer of the administration to repeal these excise taxes only in the event other taxes are increased? Is that appeal strictly fake because you know Congress will refuse to raise the already heavy taxes on American business?"

PEOPLE SUPPORT TAX REPEAL

In previous issues of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I have attempted to show the grassroots sentiments of the American people in opposition to various types of excise taxes. I have reprinted the spontaneous letters sent to me from druggists, from jewelers, from photographers, from beauty shops, and from many other businesses and professions which find themselves hamstrung by these nuisance burdens.

MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY HAS SUFFERED FROM EXCISE TAXES

At this time I should like to invite attention to the American motion-picture industry which has been tremendously hard hit by the 20-percent wartime excise taxes on admissions. And by the industry, I am not referring to the producing end in Hollywood primarily, but rather to the little fellows, to the little motion-picture house operators in my own State of Wisconsin and throughout the Nation.

These men have always cooperated, as has Hollywood itself, in patriotic drives. Right now they are helping in the March of Dimes infantile paralysis campaign. Who can forget during the war years their grand cooperation in the various conservation campaigns? No one can accuse the motion-picture industry of failing in its responsibility to the American public in our hours of greatest need.

FINE PATRIOTIC RECORD OF ENTERTAINMENT INDUSTRY

As a matter of fact, the entertainment industry in America, as a whole, has always led the way in charity efforts, in civic campaigns, and so on, giving of time, talent, money, and facilities unstintingly. Yes, the motion-picture industry has a few black sheep (or red ones) and for whom I have nothing but contempt. Those black sheep have been well publicized. But I dare any man to cite any industry which doesn't have an equal number or larger number of questionable individuals who have stepped beyond the ethical line.

But, now, on this direct issue of excise taxes on admissions, it is a fact that the number of movie patrons has declined in considerable part because of this nuisance burden. We are aware, of course, of other factors which may have partly accounted for the decline, such as television, etc.

HOW CAN INCOME TAXES BE PAID WHEN INCOMES DECLINE?

What the Administration does not seem to understand is that conditions which serve to reduce the revenue which a private business receives—that such conditions reduce by just that amount the tax base on which Uncle Sam can collect income taxes. How, in heaven's name, can a motion-picture operator in a town of 10,000, or 20,000, or 30,000, pay income taxes to Uncle Sam if he finds his house partly deserted much of the operating time because people are tired of paying through the nose a wartime rate—20 percent—rather than 10 percent or nothing in excise taxes? Already half the States and many local governments are taxing admissions, too.

CHICAGO MOVIE CONFERENCE RESOLUTION

I have in my hand a resolution which was adopted by the conference committee of the motion picture industry last August in Chicago, urging repeal of this excise tax. The organizations represented at that meeting included five exhibitor associations with members in virtually every one of the Nation's 3,000 counties, all 3 of the producer associations, and all the crafts and guilds in Hollywood which are members of the Motion Picture Industry Council, the Trade Press Publishers, the Motion Picture Association of America, and the Society of Independent Motion Picture Producers.

Obviously, the ones who are hurt the most by this nuisance wartime rate are the little fellows, who can least afford to be hurt. Yes, not only they but the employees in motion-picture houses.

I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the text of the resolution adopted by the Chicago conference and sent to me by Mr. Ned E. Depinet, chairman, be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD followed by quotations from letters and telegrams received by me from theater owners throughout Wisconsin.

I had written to them a special report on theater owners' problems and had invited their reactions. The response was immediate and gratifying. To a man, the theater owners responded with endorsement of my effort to rid their industry and other industries of this tax burden.

WHAT WILL RESULT FROM PENDING BILLS?

Now, a tax-cut amendment to H. R. 3905 is pending before us in the Senate, and the House Ways and Means Committee is starting hearings on its end. But what actual results will occur? Will there be more delays, more pious promises, more excuses? The little men and women of America await the answer—the little men for whom the the Administration pretends such affection but whom it insists on soaking and socking with these nuisance taxes.

Resolution unanimously adopted August 31, 1949, at the Chicago conference of the following motion-picture industry organizations: Allied States Association of Motion Picture Exhibitors; Independent Theater Owners Association; Metropolitian Motion Picture Theaters Association; Motion Picture Association of America; Pacific Coast Conference of Independent Theater Owners; Society of Independent Motion Picture Producers; Theater Owners of America; Trade Press Publishers; and the Hollywood Motion Picture Industry Council composed of Association of Motion Picture Producers, Hollywood A. F. of L. Film Council, Independent Motion Picture Producers Association, Independent Office Workers, Screen Actors' Guild, Screen Directors' Guild, Screen Writers' Guild, Society of Motion Picture Art Directors.

Be it resolved, That this conference of motion-picture industry organizations goes on record for immediate repeal of the wartime excise tax on admissions.

It was the solemn promise of our Government that wartime excise taxes would be lifted at the end of the war. This promise to the American people has not been kept. It should be redeemed now.

Continuation of this tax is harmful to the whole economy. It is a drain on purchasing power. It hurts the consumer.

Repeal of this levy would be one of the best and fairest ways to put increased purchasing power in the hands of all people.

The Congress should not adjourn without providing this needed relief.

We respectfully call upon our Representatives and Senators in Congress to take action without delay.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM WISCONSIN

A theater owner in Manitowoc writes:

"Thank you for your statement on the tax bill you proposed, re cutting back wartime excise tax rates to peacetime levels. I am very much interested. It is a hardship on small businesses like ours. Anything you are doing for us in this matter is greatly appreciated."

The owner and manager of Plymouth, Wis., theaters stated:

"Please accept my thanks for your help in legislation relating to the peculiar problems of the motion-picture-theater business. Your special report arrived this morning and was read with interest."

From the largest city in Wisconsin—Milwaukee—comes this message:

"We wish to thank you for your informative special report of September 15, 1949, and we have noted your interest in our business affairs.

"It is becoming more apparent that something must be done to convince the administration, and then to have laws legislated by the Congress not only to lower the tax on amusement admissions, but to eliminate this type of taxation entirely.

"By taking a direct percentage of the gross sales of any business, without consideration of the operating expense in any way, will in a short time be disastrous. The gross excise tax is certainly a vicious vampire, and it will soon place its victims in such a weakened position that only a miracle could bring about their recovery.

"On the basis of our investment, which is in a 1,200-seat theater, for the first 6 months of 1949 we have operated at a net loss of $4,095.35, while paying to the Federal Government $8,847.02 in amusement admissions tax. We have found that with this situation existing that our existence as an enterprise is being threatened, for regardless of our operating loss the tax on our gross admission sales is in no way lowered. And we feel that something must be done soon to correct this situation."

From a leader in Fond du Lac of a vital motion-picture-exhibition organization:

"I am heartily in accord with your idea on admission taxes. I know that Congress is aware of these tax problems and what it means to our business."

From Sparta, Wis.:

"As small-town exhibitors we feel that the passing of this (tax cut) bill will be a benefit to the people of our community, as well as the millions of other people who attend the movies. We know that the movies are the cheapest and, in many cases, the only form of entertainment that some people have, so naturally we try to give them as much for their money as we possibly can."

From Dodgeville, Wis., a telegram comments:

"The movies are the common man's entertainment, and we feel he should no longer be expected to carry this part of the tax burden."

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make an announcement with respect to the program that will be followed after the Senate votes upon the pending business at 3 o'clock this afternoon. Following the vote on the joint resolution and the amendments thereto we will then proceed to the call of the calendar, beginning with the first bill and going through until the last one.

Mr. WILEY. Today?

Mr. LUCAS. Following the vote on the joint resolution and the amendments thereto, which will be some time shortly after 3 o'clock this afternoon we will then proceed to call the calendar from the beginning to the end.

Tomorrow it is planned to proceed to the consideration of House bill 4080, Calendar No. 481, a bill to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Armed Services.

Following that we shall proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2440, Calendar No. 926, a bill to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has before it Senate Joint Resolution 2. There is no limitation of time so far. No vote is to be had prior to 3 o'clock. From 1 o'clock on the time is equally divided. From now until 1 o'clock, if any Senator desires recognition, he may rise and announce it. The Chair is not inviting requests for recognition, but he will exercise the authority conferred upon him by recognizing any Senator who desires to be recognized.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, as we all know, we are presumed to vote at 3 o'clock this afternoon on the pending joint resolution. Apparently no Senator desires to speak on the resolution. If that is the situation, and there is nothing to do, the Senator from Illinois will move that the Senate take a recess until 3 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Seven Senators have expressed to me the desire to be heard in favor of Senate Joint Resolution 2. None of them seems to be in the Chamber at this precise moment.

Mr. LUCAS. It is rather strange, after we have a quorum call, and the business to be transacted deals with the vote to be taken this afternoon, that seven Senators who are vitally interested in this measure are not present to proceed to make speeches upon it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to announce to the Senate that there are on the calendar two bills of Nation-wide importance. One deals with the military public-works program, which has been well screened. The bill contains only about 20 percent of the requests, consisting only of those in the high priorities. It has been on the calendar for about 8 months.

A bill dealing with the uniform code of military justice has been on the calendar for a year. If no Senator is prepared to speak on the unfinished business, I shall be very glad to take up either of these bills in the interim, because the national defense picture is something that may not wait forever until we consider it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no objection on my part if the distinguished Senator from Maryland can obtain time to present his arguments on the bills to which he refers. Then after the vote on the unfinished business we could proceed to dispose of those bills in one way or the other. There will be no objection from me.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a moment ago I made an announcement as to the program. I do not believe that either the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Maryland was present. I stated that after the vote at 3 o'clock we would then proceed to call the calendar, and that following that we would make the unfinished business House bill 4080, Calendar 481, a bill to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War. If there is no business to be transacted between now and 3 o'clock, it seems to me that we might temporarily lay aside the pending resolution and take up House bill 4080, and do some work in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Could we not resume consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 2 at 1 o'clock? I think there are a number of Senators who desire to speak, but who understand that the speaking time begins at 1 o'clock, because of the way the unanimous-consent agreement is written. According to the unanimous-consent agreement the time between one and three is to be divided between the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] and myself. I think the reason Senators are not prepared to speak at this time is that they believe that 1 o'clock is the time when the closing arguments will begin. Could we not lay aside the unfinished business for half an hour and resume consideration of it at 1 o'clock? I believe that a number of Senators are under the impression that that is the time to be present to make the brief closing arguments.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the unfinished business were temporarily laid aside, Senators could get time to speak while the other measure was pending, and if it were not disposed of before 3 o'clock it would go over. That would not stop Senators from speaking. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the time between 1 o'clock and 3 o'clock is to be controlled. My thought is that one of these bills could be disposed of in not to exceed an hour. It has been on the calendar for 8 months. It seems to me that the world is in such shape that if these military projects have a special import—and I believe many of them have—it might be wise for us to try to save civilization by strengthening our defenses. Otherwise, it will make no difference what kind of amendment to the Constitution we may adopt, if there is to be no country here to take care of.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I am in favor of saving civilization. I believe that Senate Joint Resolution 2 would accomplish a great deal toward saving civilization and improving it. I am for national defense. I am usually for anything the Senator from Maryland is for. Would his suggestion alter the arrangement whereby the Senator from Michigan and I control the time beginning at 1 o'clock?

Mr. TYDINGS. Not if there are speakers. If there are no speakers, we can proceed with the consideration of one of the bills to which I refer. If there are speakers prepared to discuss Senate Joint Resolution 2, I have no objection to their proceeding.

Mr. LODGE. Would it be in order at 1 o'clock to ask for the regular order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order which has been entered can be changed only by unanimous consent. Under the order, the time between 1 o'clock and 3 o'clock is divided between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. The time is to be controlled by them. Of course, they can yield to Senators who wish to speak upon any subject; but unless that order is changed, automatically the time between 1 o'clock and 3 o'clock is controlled.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. If a Senator is discussing another subject, and the hour of 1 o'clock arrives, will it be in order for me to ask for the regular order and request that consideration of the pending question be resumed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He would automatically have to suspend his remarks, unless some Senator having control of the time yielded to him further so that he could continue.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I think I can solve this situation, so far as the unanimous-consent agreement is concerned, as regards the time between 1 and 3 o'clock today. Unanimous consent would be required to change that order, and at this time I cannot give such consent. However, I have no objection to having the distinguished Senator from Maryland take any time he has now from 12:30 to 1 o'clock on any of these bills.

But certainly I would not wish to enter into a discussion of any of them, because I have already been notified by several Senators that they wish to be here. So I would object until a quorum call is had. If unanimous consent is requested to set the order temporarily aside, I would wish to have those Senators present, so that they could either object to or approve such procedure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, from long experience in the Senate I realize that the next half hour will be consumed by debating whether to take up the bill. Therefore I shall save time by withdrawing the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate Joint Resolution 2 is before the Senate, and is open to amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to speak upon the pending joint resolution at this time, I shall move that the Senate take a recess until 1 o'clock.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, what would be the objection to having the military public works bill considered by the Senate for the half hour between now and 1 o'clock, at which time, if it were not disposed of, the existing order would come into play.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, that is exactly the statement and the request I made, with the exception that I do not want a vote to be taken on the bill at this time. I would certainly insist on carrying it over until after 3 o'clock. Otherwise we would have to have a quorum call so that all Senators who are interested in the bill could be present and could hear the debate, and then take up the bill after 3 o'clock.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, we have just had a quorum call. Are we always to wait for Senators who do not respond to quorum calls? Are we to wait for them until it is convenient for them to come to the Senate?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to make this brief response: Some Senators who are vitally interested in this bill are not on the floor of the Senate at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why could they not be called on the telephone?

Mr. WHERRY. I do not see any objection to having the Senator from Maryland speak on the bill, anyway.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not wish to speak on the bill until it is before the Senate. Otherwise to speak on the bill would simply be wasted effort. If we can pass a measure that is vital for the defense of the country and can do so in the next 30 minutes, there is no objection, so far as I know. The bill comes to the Senate with the unanimous approval of the committee, on which there are six Republicans and seven Democrats. The bill has been on the calendar for 7 months. I have tried to have it considered time and time again. The safety of America depends to a large extent upon keeping up our defenses.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to say that I wish very much to cooperate with the distinguished Senator from Maryland, but I submit to him that unanimous consent has been given in regard to the time when the bill will come up, namely, Thursday afternoon, as I understand, or after the calendar is called today. I submit to the Senator that the only fair way to proceed is either for him to begin discussion of the bill in the time allotted to him or else get all the interested Senators on the floor, to debate the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. We have a very full calendar and a very important session, with a large deficit looming for the coming year, and with the prospect of having but one appropriation bill, to which numerous amendments will be offered, and on which considerable debate will be had. It seems to me to be a very bad practice to hold up the business of the Senate and of the country because some Senator is not on the floor, after a quorum call, in view of the entire situation which confronts us.

Certainly it is the duty of Senators to be in the Senate Chamber. In my long service I have never asked that a measure go over because I could not be in attendance in the Senate; and sometimes I was caught with engagements which were most embarrassing, which took me away when I wanted to be here.

I think the practice of objecting to the consideration of bills, following quorum calls, because certain Senators are absent, is most obnoxious to the democratic processes, and should be abandoned.

Senators should be present to transact the business on the floor of the Senate; and I protest this kind of practice in the democratic process of procedure in the Senate of the United States. It is our business to be here, to take up any kind of proposed legislation when time to do so is available. To waste an entire hour on nothing, in my opinion, is atrocious.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before I yield the floor, let me say that I find that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] is now in the Chamber, and desires to speak on the pending joint resolution. So it will not be necessary to take a recess until 1 o'clock.

I wish to subscribe wholeheartedly to what the Senator from Maryland said a moment ago. We have ready on the calendar a large number of bills, many of which are important. Many of them have been reported favorably and unanimously by various committees. Yet each time we have a call of the calendar, many of such bills have been objected to by some Senator. Of course, that is perfectly within the right of Senators. However, I wish to make one observation, which is not in the nature of a threat or anything of the sort: Some days ago I said we had a certain amount of business to do. We are going to get it done, regardless of the fact that this is a campaign year or regardless of anything else. If any Members of the Senate believe they are going to slow down the operation of the Senate because this is an election year, and if they intend to try to have this session of Congress end without the passage by Congress of a certain amount of legislation which the Democratic Policy Committee believes is absolutely necessary and indispensable to be enacted, then such Senators have another guess coming, because we will do just what we did last year, Mr. President: We will stay here, if the Senator from Illinois has his way, until we get things done.

Now I yield the floor to the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from South Carolina yield, to permit me to make one brief observation?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask the Senator to do so with the understanding that he will not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Yes, I wish to have that understanding.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, no one is more in harmony with the suggestion just made by the majority leader than I am, so far as concerns completing the program. I can assure the majority leader that, as we have done in the past, Senators on this side of the aisle are ready to take up measures as the majority leader announces them and as he will announce them for consideration on the floor of the Senate.

Now we are carrying out the program exactly as the majority leader has announced it on the floor of the Senate. If that program is to be changed, I submit that under unanimous-consent agreements the only fair and honorable thing to do is to give Members of the Senate notice that the change has been made, and give such notice before a change is made in the procedure under the unanimous-consent agreement or order. As minority leader, I shall insist upon doing so, because I think that is fair and protects every Member of the Senate, regardless of whether he is in attendance upon a committee or wherever he may be. That is all I am requesting.

I wish to assure the majority leader that the minority stands ready at any time to proceed with any program the Senator from Illinois announces, but when it is once announced, I think it ought to be carried out to the letter, or else that plenty of time be given, in order that Senators may be placed on notice and may be present to consider the other measures when a change is made.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for 1 minute?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I yield, if I may do so without losing the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am going to take 30 seconds only, but I want to protest against the suggestion of postponing proposed legislation because Senators are absent. Their absence is absolutely no excuse for the nonconsideration of important legislation at this session of the Congress. I do not think important legislation ought to be considered when we are rushed with a multitude of bills, in the last 2 months of the session. We now have time, and it is the business of Senators to be on the floor of the Senate and to act on the bills, if they are interested in them. I shall protest every postponement in the future that is based on the fact that some Senator is absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. J. Res. 2) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks in behalf of Senate Joint Resolution 2, introduced by the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on January 5, 1949.

The resolution proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing the electoral college, and providing for the counting of electoral votes for the President and Vice President in proportion to the popular vote.

Proposals of this kind have been before the Congress since 1797, only 10 years after the Constitutional Convention itself. The resolution before the Senate today is similar to Senate Joint Resolution 200 of the Eightieth Congress, which was reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee on May 3, 1948.

Extensive hearings have been held on the joint resolution. I am sure every Senator will find in the printed hearings a wealth of argument in behalf of the adoption of this constitutional amendment. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts presented to this body, on January 25, a most comprehensive and detailed analysis, together with the pros and cons, of Senate Joint Resolution 2, and also a résumé of history leading up to the present discussion of this proposed amendment.

I shall, therefore, confine my remarks to certain facts which I consider of prime importance to the country as a whole and also to my beloved section, the South.

It is indeed gratifying to me that the first proposal for such a constitutional amendment was made by a South Carolinian, Representative William L. Smith, on January 6, 1797. I am interested in seeing that this resolution is given favorable consideration for a number of reasons, several of which I shall discuss in detail.

The electoral college permits and invites irresponsible control and domination by small organized minority groups within the large pivotal States. These groups have become more and more politically conscious. In many instances they have no political alinements, or philosophy as such, but are simply up for sale to the highest bidder. To encourage economic, racial, and religious group consciousness and group action, as I see it, is a dangerous, undemocratic practice.

We have recently become alarmed over the activities of the Communist Party in the United States. Only last year I had the privilege of joining with the distinguished junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] in sponsoring a bill, S. 2311, designed to halt the rapid progress of this party in the United States. It, along with other minority groups, has its greatest following and influence in the large political States.

Mr. President, we, in the South, highly resent the fact that both parties will spend a hundred times as much money to get the Negro vote in Harlem and that the vote of a Negro there is worth a hundred times as much on the national political scene as the vote of a white man from South Carolina.

We do not believe it is fair or honest or democratic to place such a high premium on such a few votes because they happen to be from a section in Chicago, Detroit, or New York.

Political parties and political bosses can never resist the temptation of making undue appeals to minority groups whose votes mean the balance of power and the election of Presidents.

Let me quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 25, pages 883–884, a section of the discussion by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, regarding what he calls the "pressure group evil," as follows:

> Now, let me come to what I call the pressure-group evil. One of the most serious charges against the unit-rule aspect of our present system is the undeniable fact that it not only permits but actually encourages and invites the domination of presidential campaigns by small, organized, well-disciplined minority or pressure groups within the large so-called pivotal States. These pressure groups may or may not be organized into splinter parties with candidates of their own in the field, but whether they go under a party label or whether they simply operate as a bloc of votes, their influence is frequently a key factor in determining whether all of a State's electoral votes will go to one or the other of the major party candidates.
> The fact that pressure groups do hold a balance of power in States where the contest between the two major parties is close—and I call attention to the situation in New York State in the 1948 election, where Henry Wallace's party certainly exercised very great power—is an evil of the unit-rule system that has far-reaching but understandable effects. It causes both of the major parties to give undue attention to the demands and programs of relatively unimportant groups or factions. Because of the strategic position which these groups may occupy, even though in the over-all national scene the particular group may not be numerically important, they may be the vital pivot upon which a large bloc of electoral votes will turn. Hence, the major parties feel it necessary to make large concessions and enter strong bids for their support.

And again from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 25, on page 885, is the following:

> It would discourage the prevailing tendency to nominate presidential candidates only from among the residents of those States having a large electoral vote. The danger and detriment to the general welfare is obvious when the field of presidential possibilities is so restricted. The whole Nation should be the field from which to select Presidents.

I am quoting from the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, because he comes from a large State. Were I to make a similar statement, it would be said, "The Senator from South Carolina is speaking thus because he comes from a small State." I continue the quotation:

> It would effectively and substantially reduce the undue influence which balance-of-power minority, pressure, or "splinter" factions exercise in the large pivotal States and the big cities. No longer would these groups be capable of swinging large blocs of electoral votes—and perhaps the election. These factions, if they enter the arena of presidential politics at all, would have to do so purely on the basis of their own merit. They would be no stronger than the number of votes actually cast for them. Because their numbers are small, they would in all probability receive little national attention. Their frequently assumed role of pivot in key States would no longer give them their presently exaggerated importance.

The amendment, Mr. President, would follow the present provision of the Constitution in leaving the question of the qualifications of voters to the States. It would require no uniformity of qualifications as among the different States. This provision is highly important to me because I thoroughly detest and will fight against any invasion of States' rights in any form.

In the past and at the present time, presidential campaigns are not prosecuted in the nondoubtful or strongly one-party States. Neither of the major parties is sufficiently concerned to wage an educational or constructive campaign in these States because they know that they either are certain to win, or they do not have a chance to win. This situation has resulted in unfair distribution of projects in certain one-party States.

I believe that under the amendment proposed by the pending resolution all the States would gain more recognition for their outstanding men as possible candidates for President and Vice President.

The objective under the present system is to choose someone from a highly doubtful State or a highly populated State because of the desire to capture the full electoral vote of that State.

Mr. President, there was what I consider one major pitfall in the present resolution, in that it provided for the election of the President and Vice President by mere plurality of the popular vote. I do not believe that a nominee should be named to the highest office in this land to rule with the broad and extended powers that, of necessity, under certain conditions, must be granted to this office by the Congress, unless he has received the endorsement of at least 40 percent of the voters of the Nation. It would have been possible under this resolution for minority parties to take control of the government while having received only 25 percent of the popular vote cast. I agree that history has shown us that it is possible to elect a man to the highest office in this land with as little as 39 percent of the popular vote. In this connection, however, it must be remembered that it has been agreed that under the present system the popular vote means very little, and that the electoral vote elects the President. The present requirements are that a nominee must receive a majority of the electoral vote.

I had offered an amendment to the pending resolution which provided that if a nominee to the office of President did not receive at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then the House of Representatives would choose, as provided under the present system, the President and Vice President. I am happy to learn that yesterday the authors of the resolution agreed to a similar amendment offered by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] providing that if a nominee did not receive at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then from the persons having the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President, the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session should choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

I am confident that this amendment is an adequate safeguard and will do away with the formation of so-called splinter parties.

It is my earnest hope that this resolution and the Lucas amendment will be favorably acted on by the Senate body this afternoon, because I believe it will do a great deal of good for our Nation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I recently asked the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] if it would be permissible if, during the time scheduled for debate, I might have 10 minutes of the time allotted to the Senator from Michigan, and he has informed me that that is possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time will not be divided and allotted until 1 o'clock.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk an amendment which I intend to offer. It is in the nature of a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 2, which is a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of the President and the Vice President. My amendment would strike out the resolving clause of Senate Joint Resolution 2 and the text of that resolution, and would insert in lieu thereof my provision for the direct election of the President and the Vice President of the United States by popular vote.

I want at the outset, Mr. President, to pay my tribute to Senate Joint Resolution 2 as a definitive step in the direction of greater democratization of our electoral process. It is in that vein that I shall support that amendment, should the substitute amendment which I propose be defeated and the Lodge amendment comes to the floor for a vote. It is my profound feeling, however, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is thoroughly inadequate. The brunt of the case against the present method of electing a President and a Vice President is that it allows a candidate to be chosen President of the United States even though he did not receive approval by popular vote. I suggest, therefore, that those who realize the dangers to democratic institutions in America arising from such a defect in our basic law should join with me in support of the amendment which I propose to offer, since under the provisions of the Lodge amendment it would still be possible for a candidate for President of the United States to be defeated for office even though he should receive a majority of the popular vote.

Both the procedure as it now exists, and the procedure as it would exist should the Lodge amendment be enacted, would permit a minority President to be elected. I realize that such a contingency would be far less likely under the Lodge amendment than under the present system, and that is why I would support it. But if one of the arguments used by the proponents of Senate Joint Resolution 2 is that the present system may conceivably result in a minority President, then I say we should be formulating a constitutional provision which would eliminate once and for all any possibility of a minority President.

There is no reason, Mr. President, why one American should have a vote which counts for more than that of a fellow-American. To prevent a citizen in New York or California or Pennsylvania or Ohio or Minnesota from having a vote equal to his fellow-American in Nevada or Delaware, or any other similar citizen, is not only inequitable, but violates the democratic process. The Lodge amendment does not eliminate this fundamental inequity in that it would give, on the basis of the 1948 election statistics, a voter in Nevada as much weight as four in Colorado, or five in Pennsylvania, or almost eight in California. This is due to the fact that the Lodge amendment, even though it abolishes the electoral college—a desirable end—continues to count electoral votes by States. The amendment I propose, Mr. President, would give every American an equal vote with his fellow American regardless of the State in which he may reside.

The present constitutional defects in the method of electing the President and the Vice President of the United States have clearly been demonstrated during the course of the hearings before the Judiciary Committee on Senate Joint Resolution 2, and they are supported by the report of that committee, Report No. 602, and ably presented by the Senator from Massachusetts on the floor of the Senate.

From the very beginning of our constitutional development, Mr. President, our present electoral system was under severe attack by advocates of democratic practices. During the days of the Constitutional Convention, Madison and Benjamin Franklin chose to speak for a direct election of the President of the United States, and agreed to the electoral college system under protest. Since that day, repeated efforts have been made to democratize our presidential election procedure. The first annual message of President Andrew Jackson on December 8, 1829, declared: "To the people belongs the right of electing their Chief Magistrate." He declared that "the first principle of our system is that the majority is to govern," and urged an amendment to the Constitution. He said:

> In this, as in all matters of public concern, policy requires that as few impediments as possible should exist to the free operation of the public will. Let us then endeavor so to amend our system that the Office of Chief Magistrate may not be conferred upon any citizen, but in pursuance of a firm expression of the will of the majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the time from now on is to be controlled by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. The Chair understands the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] yields 10 minutes to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to ask at this time if it would be possible for me to have 10 minutes of the time allotted to the side of the Senator from Massachusetts under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to grant the Senator that much time, although the time is now getting short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the arrangement, the Senator from Minnesota will be recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, history has demonstrated that the fears expressed by our fathers were well founded. An analysis of a few incidents in American history suffices to demonstrate the basic defects of our present constitutional system. Three Presidents of the United States have been elected to office in spite of the fact that they received a smaller popular vote numerically than did their opponents. I refer to the election of President Adams in 1824, President Hayes in 1876, and President Harrison in 1888.

In the election of 1824, the American people faced the choice of electing Andrew Jackson, his nearest opponent, John Quincy Adams, William H. Crawford, or Henry Clay. There were four candidates in the field, and because of that fact the leading candidate, Andrew Jackson, who led his nearest opponent, John Quincy Adams, by about 50,000 votes, nevertheless lacked a majority over his three opponents. In view of the fact that no candidate received a majority vote, the election was thrown into the House of Representatives under the terms of our Constitution. In the House of Representatives, intrigue and manipulation took place and, as a result, John Quincy Adams, the minority choice, was elected President of the United States, in spite of the fact that Andrew Jackson received 50,000 more votes out of the 460,000 votes cast.

The Hayes-Tilden contest of 1876 was another illustration of our constitutional electoral college defect, Mr. President. Mr. Hayes received 264,292 votes less than Tilden. The total for each was 4,036,998 votes cast for Hayes, and 4,300,590 for Tilden. This time, because of the fact that under our Constitution the people of the United States do not elect the President of the United States, Hayes was elected President through securing a majority of one vote in the Electoral Commission which was created to settle the contest in 1876.

Again in 1888 Grover Cleveland was defeated for President, even though he received more popular votes than Benjamin Harrison. The vote in this election was 5,556,543 for Cleveland, and 5,175,582 for Harrison, with a total of 12,000,000 votes cast. This, too, was due to the operation of the electoral-college system.

Again I wish to recall the fact that at the time of the debates on the Constitution, and during the period of the Constitutional Convention, the gentleman who was often referred to as the Father of the Constitution, James Madison, was a strong proponent of direct election of the President. The man who might well be classified as the philosopher and conciliator of the Constitution, Benjamin Franklin, was likewise a strong proponent of popular election of the President. One of our Presidents, who served with distinction, and was known to represent the people's will, in fact, who was often spoken of as having a mandate from the people, Andrew Jackson, in his first message to the Congress in his first term as President proposed the direct election of the President as a means of democratizing the American election process.

The electoral-college vote is no indication of the popular vote. The requirement for the electoral college was written into the Constitution in an era, Mr. President, which was fearful of popular rule, and is an attempt to substitute a rule of the elite for a rule of the majority. Even this plan of our constitutional fathers, however, never operated as it was originally intended. In fact, the electoral college has not resulted in a rule of the elite in any sense; it has, in fact, resulted, on occasion, in the rule of a minority without any particular virtue attached to it, and has on other occasions merely meant election by tabulation, however imperfect.

The American people, Mr. President, have a right to elect the President of the United States. In my opinion, that right is not only borne out by the logic of our democratic processes but it is also testified to by those who have been the authors and the creators of our constitutional system.

The American people must be given a legal voice and the right ultimately to decide who the President of the United States should be. The constitutional amendment which I propose, Mr. President, is designed to do just that. It is designed to take one more step toward enlarging the area of choice for the American people and toward greater democracy.

It is in line with the same kind of advance on the democratic front as the direct election of United States Senators. The original Constitution provided for the selection of Senators by the legislatures of the respective States. It became the determined will of the American people that Senators should be elected by direct popular vote, and it appears to me that a maturing democracy would wish to see the Chief Magistrate, who occupies the highest office in the gift of the people, the most important office in the world, elected by a majority vote of the election constituency.

The electoral college cannot accurately reflect the wishes and preferences of the American voters. I have already described in detail the three flagrant illustrations of the thwarting of American popular will in presidential elections. There are other illustrations, however, which lead to conclusions equally as critical of our present Constitution. In 1912 Woodrow Wilson received 82 percent of the electoral vote, but he received only 42 percent of the popular vote. Here, indeed, was a relatively close election, but to read the electoral vote would create an illusion that the election was in fact a landslide. In this election Woodrow Wilson received 1 electoral vote for each 145,000 popular votes, and Taft received only 1 electoral vote for each 435,000 popular votes.

In 1923 John W. Davis received 6,000,000 popular votes from which he received no electoral votes. From 2,000,000 other popular votes, however, he received 136 electoral votes. The same disparity took place in 1932, when out of the 15,800,000 votes cast for Herbert Hoover, more than 13,600,000 of them brought no electoral votes. In 1936 Franklin Roosevelt received 98 percent of the electoral vote, even though he received only 60 percent of the popular vote.

Here we have illustrations, Mr. President, of 6,000,000 voters in the 1924 election whose votes for John W. Davis did not count, and never earned for him any electoral votes. And again in 1932 13,600,000 Americans, Mr. President, found that their votes did not count, and they in turn gave their candidate, Herbert Hoover, no electoral votes.

Mr. President, we are told that since the electoral college is but a formality, why not preserve that formal identification with the age of our fathers? The electoral college, however, is not a mere formality. It is a stark reality. Like the human appendix, the electoral college is useless, unpredictable, and a possible center of inflammation. It stands constantly in the minds of Americans as a threat to popular rule. The influence of the electoral-vote system is always found in a presidential campaign from the prenomination stage until the final returns are in. So long as the Constitution remains unchanged on this vital issue, the possibilities of the popular will being ignored, the possibilities of confusion, remain ever present.

I digress for a moment to point out that the two major political parties in considering a potential candidates for the office of President and for the office of Vice President frequently give more consideration to the area the individuals come from than as to the capacities or the abilities they might have or possess to serve as Chief Executive and as Vice President. In other words, the key States of which we often speak, in which a large electoral vote is available, have been a controlling force in the prenomination stage of political party conventions, and in political determination for the strategy of an election. Likewise the electoral-college system continues to plague the Nation with what may well be called a one-party system. Those who wish to register their objection to a particular administration in some areas of the country find it practically impossible to do so because of the inability to count a vote, for example, in some of the Southern States, for the Republican Party. It is not exactly my purpose to plead the cause of strengthening the Republican Party to undue power, but it appears to me that if a man wishes to vote for an opposition candidate in an election, he should have his vote tallied, and his vote should mean something.

The American people have a right to elect their President by direct popular vote, just as they now enjoy the right to elect their governors by direct popular vote. For the past 160 years we in the United States have made a steady march toward greater and greater democracy by the election process. By developing a political party system, we transformed the electoral college from a college of the elite to a political tabulator, even though our history is still replete with proof that it frequently is an inaccurate tabulator.

I may go back into the American history again to point out, Mr. President, that the American electoral-college system, as it was originally conceived, was an effort to remove the office of the Chief Magistrate from the popular control of the American people. The electoral-college system was even an effort to remove it from what might be called partisan conflict. After the first President, Washington, we had the development of a two-party system. At the time of the election we had the so-called Federalists who composed the one party in the original election of George Washington. Following his second term the Jeffersonian Democrats lined up against the so-called Federalists. The Federalist Party later faded out of the picture. Remnants of it became the Whig Party which at a still later stage became the Republican Party.

The political-party structure in America was a unique means developed by the American people in their desire for popular rule to eliminate the effectiveness of the electoral-college system as it had been originally intended.

Again I wish to call the attention of our colleagues who are with us on the floor at this hour that the men who were primarily responsible for the structure of our constitutional system, the men who played the greatest part in it, those whose names we remember with the greatest respect as members of the Constitutional Convention, James Madison and Benjamin Franklin, were the chief proponents of the direct election of President. So let no one say the proposal I submit is a new idea. Let no one feel that it is a departure which goes beyond the intent and the purpose of the creators of the Constitution, because, in fact, the electoral-college system was considered at its best to be a miserable compromise at the time it was incorporated into the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. I fully agree with everything the able Senator from Minnesota has said. I favor his amendment. But I fear that if it should be adopted, the resolution itself would be defeated. Can the Senator allay my apprehensions on this point?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, first of all, I may say to my good friend, the Senator from West Virginia, that the junior Senator from Minnesota is not even of the opinion that his amendment is going to be adopted. However, I wish it could be adopted, because I think it provides an appropriate way of conducting elections for the offices of President of the United States and Vice President of the United States. I recognize that the proposal for the direct election of the President has been fought over and been the subject of contest in American history for years. I feel that my amendment offers an approach we need to be considering and working on.

I have told many of my colleagues on the floor of the Senate that should my amendment be defeated, it is my intention to support the so-called Lodge amendment, because I think it is a step in the right direction. I think it represents definitive progress. I recognize that we sometimes have to inch along when some of us would like to gallop along. I am perfectly willing to make that kind of a compromise. But I feel that as we make compromises we ought to state the principle around which compromises should be determined. In other words, to compromise on the basis of the electoral system is not a compromise. That is no compromise at all. The electoral-college system in its very beginning was at its best a miserable compromise in an almost impossible situation. It resulted from a problem in the Constitutional Convention which almost wrecked the convention.

Therefore, I have two purposes in presenting the amendment. First of all, it is my purpose to appeal for support and ask the Members of the United States Senate to line up behind the principle of majority rule, to line up behind the principle of direct government by the consent of the governed, and to get behind the principle of popular rule. I recognize that the possibilities of favorable action are very limited. I realize some of the practical difficulties we encounter in this sort of debate. However, I think it is important that we understand what the true principle in a democratic society ought to be. The true principle is, first, majority rule with a clear definition and respect of minority rights as protected by law. Under the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Minnesota every vote will count; all the minority votes will count and all the majority votes will count.

Mr. President, there is hardly any system of electing a President which, theoretically at least, is more undemocratic than the electoral-college system, which literally throws away millions of votes of citizens who have just as strong convictions as to the rightness of their decision as the majority that may be demonstrated by the electoral college.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will say to the Senator that I have only 2 minutes remaining in which to complete my statement. If I can conclude my statement in less than 2 minutes, I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. Very well. I shall wait.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, as I have stated, the American people have a right to elect their President by direct popular vote, just as they now enjoy the right to elect their governors by direct popular vote. For the past 160 years we in the United States have made a steady march toward greater and greater democracy. By developing a political-party system, as I pointed out, we transformed the electoral college from a college of the elite to a political tabulator, even though our history is still replete with proof that it frequently is an inaccurate tabulator. By constitutional amendment we extended the right of franchise to our women. By constitutional amendment we have strengthened our democratic process further by providing that Senators of the United States should be elected by the people and not by State legislatures.

We have been continually reasserting our faith in democracy by proclaiming that the people themselves have the right to rule themselves; that they have the right to elect their representatives and their leaders; that we place our faith in the judgment of the people more than in the judgment of any elite. Here indeed is the essential lifeblood of democracy which distinguishes it from any form of totalitarianism.

I may say at this time that once Theodore Roosevelt was asked a question about the principle of majority rule. He made an answer to the effect that in the long run any majority will make fewer mistakes than any selected minority. Personally and congenitally it is impossible for me to understand how the elite can feel that somehow or other some people, by reason of some strange quirk of their personality or geographical situation, have a greater insight into how to be the masters or how to govern other people. The American people have the right to elect the President of the United States. More than any other public official, he is all the people's representation. To perpetuate a system under which a minority candidate can be elected President of the United States is to negate the people's will. I urge the Senate to approve my amendment and allow the people of the United States, though constitutional ratifying conventions in the States, to decide this issue.

Mr. TAFT. Has the Senator's time expired?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think there is about a half minute left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President—

> New occasions teach new duties;
> Time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still, and onward,
> Who would keep abreast of truth.

All who approve this wise New England doctrine; all who yearn for political reform; and all who believe in government by the people should be deeply grateful to the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] for having introduced the pending joint resolution and for having, with the industry of the busy little bee, the persistence of the English bulldog, and the patience of a hundred patriarchal Jobs, brought to the day and hour of senatorial decision his praiseworthy proposal to deliver the Nation from the antiquated nuisance known as the electoral college.

Mr. President, the eminent Scottish philosopher, David Hume, in his essay on the rise of arts and sciences, included a profound observation which is adopted as a text for my remarks. These were Mr. Hume's relevant words:

> To balance a large state or society, whether monarchical or republican, on general laws, is a work of so great difficulty that no human genius, however comprehensive, is able by the mere dint of reason and reflection to effect it. The judgments of many must unite in the work; experience must guide their labor; time must bring it to perfection; and the feeling of inconveniences must correct the mistakes which they inevitably fall into in their first trials and experiments.

The object of Senate Joint Resolution No. 2 is to terminate certain hardships arising from mistakes made by the famous fifty-five who, on the 14th of May 1787, assembled in Philadelphia to revise the Articles of Confederation.

The constitutional amendment which the resolution proposes would, if ratified, consummate these reforms:

First, abolish the ghost office of presidential elector and confirm the right of the people to elect the President and Vice President of the United States.

Second, eliminate the undemocratic and curiously circumscribed power of the House of Representatives to umpire presidential elections deadlocked because no candidate had received a majority of the electoral votes. It would require elections to be decided on the basis of the highest number of electoral votes received. In the unlikely event of an electoral-vote tie, the decision would be in favor of the recipient of the largest number of popular votes.

Third, it would annul the unit rule under which, in most States, all the electoral votes are awarded the candidate who receives a plurality of the popular vote. The amendment would require the electoral vote to be apportioned in accordance with the popular vote. The candidate who had the greatest number of such votes would receive the greatest number of electoral votes, but he would not receive them all.

SOME OF THE EVILS OF THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

On no problem did the Convention of 1787 expend more time and effort than on that of devising a suitable method of choosing a President. With no provision of the Constitution did its authors express greater satisfaction than they voiced concerning the method finally devised for selecting the Chief Executive of the Republic. As Hamilton pointed out in the Federalist, it was the only part of the great charter which was not condemned by its opponents. But history proves that since the days of Hamilton this clause of the Constitution has created many difficulties. Every political signboard proclaims that it is now, and if not modified, will continue to be a grave menace to our domestic tranquillity and peace.

The constitutional scheme provided for the selection of the President by what is commonly called the electoral college. It was assumed that each State would choose as its members of the college men of mature wisdom and experience who, animated only by pure patriotism, would make the proper choice. The critical fact is that these electors were supposed to exercise their individual judgment without regard to the popular will. The average person was not deemed capable of deciding questions of great public importance. To each State was reserved the right to choose its electors by any method it saw fit to adopt.

In accordance with these generally accepted views colleges of this type were twice created and on both occasions the Presidency was awarded to the immortal Washington.

In 1796 the third college was elected, largely on party lines; and the fourth, in 1800, was elected entirely on such lines. From then until now the members of the College of Sages have, in general, been denied all independence of action. Yet for a hundred and fifty years we have been saddled with the old and outmoded procedure whereby the voter's choice is expressed through men who ordinarily have little more than average intelligence, experience, and education and who, in any event, are pledged in advance to vote for a designated candidate.

Although comparisons are always odious, and sometimes dangerous, I nevertheless venture to compare the electoral college to the vermiform appendix. In ages past it may have served a useful physiological purpose, but now it constitutes a peril to life and a menace to health. Just as appendicitis may be either acute or chronic, so also the political appendicitis to which the electoral college may give rise may take the form of either a mild attack or a fatal peritonitis.

That danger is real and not academic. The elector is not legally bound to vote for the candidates of his party for President or Vice President. He may, if he chooses, utterly ignore the mandate of the people.

This very perversion of democratic justice actually occurred as recently as 1948.

The electoral-college appendix also gives rise to a multitude of other serious ailments. In many States the people vote not for President but for a long list of electoral candidates. Hundreds of thousands of voters have been disfranchised as a result of the errors they made in attempting to use the confusing ballots containing the electors' names. It has also happened that ineligible electors have been chosen—with the result that their votes for President and Vice President were invalidated. What confusion, what misfortune might result if invalidated electoral votes should determine the election or defeat of a presidential candidate.

And what greater misfortune might result if 531 relatively inexperienced, untrained electors were, in fact, called upon to exercise their independent judgment in selecting a President This could easily occur if a successful candidate became incapacitated before the electors met to cast their votes.

The proposed amendment, if ratified, would eliminate all these complications and dangers by abolishing the fictitious, fossilized office of presidential elector.

An additional objective of the resolution is that of improving the method of electing the President in the event no candidate receives a majority of the electoral votes. Such deadlocked elections are now thrust into the House of Representatives, which chooses the President from among the three leading candidates. Each State delegation has one and only one vote. Consequently, 25 such States votes could settle the election in the House.

Under this procedure all States, regardless of differences in population, are given equal power in electing the President. The popular will may thus be wholly ignored. It was notoriously thwarted in 1824, when the House chose John Quincy Adams in preference to Andrew Jackson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). The time allotted to the Senator from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts graciously yield me five additional minutes?

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. NEELY. I thank the Senator sincerely.

Mr. President, not less dangerous is the circumstances that the House itself might become deadlocked, with the appalling result that even in a time of crisis the country might be without a Chief Executive.

The amendment would entirely eliminate this danger. The candidate having, not a majority, but the greater number of electoral votes, would be declared President. If the result of this procedure should be a tie, then the Presidency would be awarded to the candidate for whom the greatest number of popular votes had been cast.

THE EVIL OF THE UNIT RULE

The final nuisance which the resolution is designed to abate is the unit rule. At the present, in all but a few States, the entire electoral vote is awarded to the candidate who receives a bare plurality of the popular vote. In many of the States the candidate who obtains a plurality of a single vote wins all his State's electoral votes. Popular disfranchisement is the shocking consequence of this procedure. And the result may be the election of a President by a minority of the voters, or the election of a candidate who has more electoral votes, but fewer popular votes than his leading opponent.

It is regretfully realized that it is beyond the scope of the resolution to make the election of a President by a minority an absolute impossibility. This desirable impossibility can never be assured except by the nullification of the great compromise under which each State, regardless of its population, is granted a bonus of two electoral votes.

The complete expression of the principle of popular sovereignty is a consummation worthy of universal desire. In every State in the Union, whether its population be great or small, a vote should be a vote—and no more. A constitutional amendment providing for the election of the President and Vice President by the direct vote of the people instead of by the indirect device of allocating the electoral votes of the various States would command my unhesitating support. But, for obvious reasons which need not be stated, I fear that the pending measure would be defeated if it were amended so as to include this desirable reform. Doubtless it could be persuasively argued that every reformation should wear the garments of perfection from the moment of its birth till the end of its days. Nevertheless, in this case, as in a thousand others, "heaven is not reached at a single bound."

In my opinion, the resolution, notwithstanding its minor imperfections, proposes a notable improvement in the existing system. The modification would, in practice, almost, if not entirely, eliminate the chance that a presidential candidate who receives the largest number of electoral votes would be declared President over an opponent who has polled a larger proportion of the popular vote.

The unit rule, as it now operates, encourages the selection of presidential candidates from a few "pivotal States." In the distant past, the South supplied the nation with a number of distinguished Chief Executives. But in recent years, it has not provided a single major party candidate for President. In this important matter New England has approached the low level of the States south of the Mason and Dixon's line. These regions are certainly not lacking in men and women who possess presidential qualifications. These should not be deprived of a chance to serve their country in the highest of all official capacities.

The unit rule provides minority groups in doubtful States political power disproportionate to their voting strength. In these States it increases the possibility of corruption and deprives the people of the "safe" States of the benefit of vigorously contested elections.

Mr. President, the proposed constitutional amendment would, if ratified, either wholly eliminate or greatly minimize all the evils we have mentioned and a number of others which we do not have time to discuss. Under the amended Constitution, every vote for President or Vice President would count. No longer would millions of voters be deprived of their right to support the candidate of their choice.

Campaign battles would be fought in every State in the Union. The entire country, and not just doubtful States, would become the reservoir of Presidential candidates. And the excessive influence which balance-of-power minority factions now exercise in the large pivotal States and the great cities would be ended. The various groups in these States and cities would, like others, be obliged to wage their political warfare on merit and not on the basis of strategic geographical location.

At this critical hour, when the world is menaced by a ruthless power which has no regard for constitutional forms or individual rights, it is especially important that we increase our efforts to strengthen our constitutional structure so as further to extend and safeguard popular sovereignty.

All too often a defect in a dam is repaired only after a disastrous flood.

All too often an appendix operation is performed too late to save the patient's life.

The constitutional infirmities which the resolution seeks to remedy are of structure and not of detail. The afflictions are malignant, not benign. The time to operate is now. Next year may be too late.

The heavy responsibility of attempting to amend the Constitution is duly recognized and thoroughly understood. We know that the founding fathers intended that amendments should not be undertaken without mature consideration and adequate investigation, and then only in accordance with the dictates of clear conscience and sound judgment.

Nevertheless I plead for this amendment on the grounds of common necessity, common sense and common service, and support my appeal with the following observations of the illustrious Thomas Jefferson:

> Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence and deem them like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the preceding age a wisdom more than human and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well; I belonged to it and labored with it. It deserves well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and 40 years of experience in government is worth a century of book reading; and this they would say themselves, were they to rise from the dead. I am certainly not an advocate of frequent and untried changes in laws and institutions * * * but I know also, that laws and institutions go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also, and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regime of their barbarous ancestors.

Two years before his death, Jefferson wrote this immortal postscript:

> Nothing, then, is unchangeable but the inherent and unalienable rights of man.

Mr. President, let us promote these cherished rights by promptly adopting the resolution before us. Let us speed the achievement of its lofty objectives to unshackle popular suffrage, invigorate men's rights, fire their ambitious, extend their political horizons and inspire them to see and think and act for themselves.

After the passage of the resolution and the ratification of its proposal, we can justly, proudly, and truthfully proclaim that popular government in the United States has, at last, been ceremoniously and certainly crowned and sceptered and enthroned.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, I favor the passage of Senate Joint Resolution No. 2, as introduced by the able junior Senator from Massachusetts, for himself and other Senators. I do so, based upon reasons he has so forcefully expounded.

The electoral-college system is an anachronism today, as outmoded as the horse and buggy of yesteryear in this era of supersonic speed. Whatever purpose it may have served in years gone by, it is considered by citizens today to be a roundabout, thoroughly unsatisfactory and unreliable procedure for insuring exact selection in the highest office of our Government.

That it has several times resulted in the selection of a candidate receiving less than a majority of the popular vote is valid argument for a change. The fact that the operations of the electoral-college system are a complete mystery to the vast majority of our citizens offers further sound reason for bringing the presidential-election processes more closely into line with common sense and businesslike procedures.

Through the years, the citizens of the country have been at the mercy of the chosen electors who have been bound, not by directives founded in the laws of the land, but by political considerations entirely. The proposed constitutional amendment would remove any possibility of a complete disregard of the expressed choice of the voters.

This amendment would restore to millions of voters, particularly in States where either party is greatly in the minority, their right of Presidential franchise, so to speak. Today there is small incentive to any voter in such areas to go to the polls, because of the certainty that his or her vote would not be reflected in any way whatsoever in the returns.

Anything that can be done to interest more people in exercising their voting privileges will strengthen democratic processes and make for a more healthy governmental situation. This result I believe Senate Joint Resolution 2 would help to accomplish. Furthermore, it also would make less likely the present danger that a candidate receiving the largest popular vote might well fail to attain to the highest office in the land because his opponent, by slim majorities in a few more populous States, could attain a greater electoral-college total, despite his smaller popular vote.

By correcting this situation, I confidently believe we would attract additional millions of voters to the polls for Presidential elections. When one remembers the pitifully small proportion of voters who have cast ballots in some recent Presidential-election years, any move to improve this situation would be decidedly worth while. There can be little doubt that the adoption of this constitutional amendment would accomplish many desired and desirable results.

For these reasons, I favor the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington will support Senate Joint Resolution 2 for a number of reasons, from among which he wishes to offer the following for consideration by his colleagues.

I hope the joint resolution becomes the law of the land, because I was born in the South and received my college education in the State of Tennessee, because I have lived most of my life in the State of Washington and throughout the Pacific Northwest, because I believe in the right and opportunity to freely compete, and because I am a Republican who has a tremendous pride in and respect for the political party to which I belong.

Mr. President, as one who began his life in the South as a member of a family which came first to Virginia more than three centuries ago, I am fully conscious of the unlimited promise which that great area possesses, and I am keenly aware of its serious and outstanding obstacles and weaknesses. To my mind, the South has not yet realized its possibilities, because under the protective cloak of a one-party system it continues to live in the past. The passage of Senate Joint Resolution 2 would create, almost overnight, a vigorous and alert two-party system below the Mason and Dixon's line. Southerners would be required to choose sides and to make a choice as between alternatives presented to them by both Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Does not the Senator think that such a consummation would be a blessing to the American people?

Mr. CAIN. The substance of everything I shall say in approximately 5 minutes will be in support of the feeling just expressed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. President, southerners would be stimulated to rid themselves of the disappointing degree of political apathy and indifference which the record proves they still have. The passage of Senate Joint Resolution 2 would return the Southern States to the Union. This would be good for the South, as every intelligent and self-respecting southerner knows; and the resulting good would bring added strength, stamina, and vigor to the United States of America.

The passage of the joint resolution would help to create a dynamic Republican Party in the sovereign State of Washington, which I represent in the Senate. I think it proper to speak frankly about my political hopes for the resolution which is before us. The Republican Party in my own home State has distressingly lost in recent years some of its will and desire to wage vigorous war with the opposition. Because my party at home has lost all the electoral votes for years, too many have made up their minds, even though the margins of loss have been narrow, that the electoral votes are lost forever. The passage of Senate Joint Resolution 2 would either restore the Republican Party in Washington State to a position of authority or cause it to go practically out of business. The determination of what ought to happen to the political parties in the State of Washington would be vested where it belongs, in the hands of the people, if the resolution before us prevails.

As an American who believes in free competition, I am strongly in favor of the resolution. Its passage would provide the Republican Party, for the first time in its history, with an opportunity to present its program and its candidates to all the people of the country. For decades, the Republican Party has not even bothered to lay its case before the people who live in certain States of the Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted to the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield me an additional minute?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator an additional minute.

Mr. CAIN. Tragically, the Republicans have thought that no progress could be made within the Southern States. Even more tragically, the Democrats have paid no attention to the citizens in these same States, because the Democrats have concluded logically that the southerner only had one way in which to go. Competition is the only medium through which progress and health and growth can be guaranteed. The passage of the joint resolution will justify the possession of the rights and opportunities for every American citizen, for the first time since the fashioning of a nation on this continent.

I stand strongly for the passage of this resolution, Mr. President, because I am a Republican. I believe in my party and in its principles. I am not basically concerned with the results of future elections in America. My chief concern is with that character of machinery which will permit my party and its candidates to be heard. If my party fails to produce the right candidates, or if it fails to write a program which our people want or think they want, my party is not entitled to be victorious. All my party has a right to want is an even chance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one concluding sentence?

Mr. LODGE. I yield one more minute to the Senator.

Mr. CAIN. I am convinced that the passage of the pending resolution will be good and beneficial for the Southern States, for the West, for the Nation. It goes without saying that what is good for America is good for politics generally and for the Republican Party to which the junior Senator from Washington belongs.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there have now been four speakers on the side of the proponents. I should be glad to let the Senator from Michigan put on some of his speakers at this time, if he desires to do so.

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not wish to proceed. If the Senator can use some of his time for other speakers, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. LODGE. I have already put on four speakers. I want to save some time in which to sum up. But I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey for 2 minutes, if he desires to speak at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I addressed myself to this subject 2 days ago, and do not propose to repeat the arguments I made at that time. I tried to point out then that it was my conviction the proposed joint resolution would strengthen the two-party system in America. Today I wish to confine my concluding remarks in the space of 2 minutes to one single argument which in my opinion is of transcendent importance.

The able Senator from Massachusetts, who has led the forces seeking to submit this amendment to the people, has himself stated my main argument in these words:

> It spreads the Presidential campaign and any subsequent Presidential political activity into all the 48 States.

That is the preponderant argument, for the joint resolution, it seems to me, if we are to increase the vitality of our political system.

I submit, Mr. President, that on that score alone the Congress should vote overwhelmingly to submit this proposed amendment to the legislatures of the 48 States.

We are faced here with a question of the vitality of our democracy. We are proud in our country of the fact that every qualified citizen is entitled to vote. We are continually urging that voters come to the polls on election day to exercise this most precious political right. And yet we know that, under the present system of Presidential elections, in many States the choice between the candidates of the two major parties is a foregone conclusion. There is no real political contest. A Democrat in Maine or a Republican in South Carolina, for instance, knows that his vote for the Presidential candidate of his choice will be a wasted vote. There is little wonder that such a voter, as often as not, stays home on election day. Let me at this point call attention to the fact that in the last Presidential election, with nearly 90,000,000 eligible voters, only 45,000,000 exercised the franchise. That represents a very critical situation.

Senate Joint Resolution 2 proposes an amendment which, for the first time, would give some meaning to the right of these minority voters to vote for the office of President. They would know that their votes would be counted in the final outcome. As a result, for the first time we would find that the Presidential campaign was a vital contest, not simply in a few pivotal States but in every State of the Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 1 minute more?

Mr. LODGE. I yield 1 minute more.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, this is no time for the close calculation of political advantage. I have no idea whether in the long run the proposed amendment would benefit the Democratic Party or the Republican Party. I am frank to say I feel it would benefit the Republican Party, of which I am a member; but I do not know. But, no matter which party we adhere to, all of us as Americans have a profound stake in the vitality of our democracy. I am convinced that the proposed amendment would improve its vitality by giving real meaning to the votes of each and every American, everywhere in the land.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes at the present time. I merely wish to summarize certain of the things I have said previously on the pending subject.

There is a misconception that the amendment provides for popular vote in the elections of President and Vice President of the United States. The popular-vote idea was not pursued originally in the Constitution because of the thought that it was necessary to federate into one union the various sovereign States. The framers of the Constitution thought so favorably of the idea of federation that they were willing to provide for the election of President by a system which did not recognize popular voting. The idea was to give to every State at least three electoral votes, one for each Senator and each Representative in Congress. Whereas all States must have at least one Representative, provision was made that each State should have at least three representatives in the electoral college. It was carried further. It was provided that if no candidate received an electoral majority and an election were thrown into the House of Representatives, there again the unit rule would be recognized. It would be recognized that each State was entitled to at least one vote, which would place each State upon an equal footing. The sole reason for that was the idea of trying to make and preserve a Federal union.

The Senator from Michigan has not advocated and does not now advocate retaining the electoral college. He does not advocate the idea that a member of the electoral college can vote in a different way than that decided by the people of his State when they elected him. There is no doubt that direct popular vote is in theory the best way of electing the President and Vice President of the United States. The Senator from Michigan would go along with that idea if the electors in each State were of equal qualifications. If the United States Congress could establish the qualifications for voters, and if they were the same in each State, in theory, the ideal situation would be achieved. But, at the same time, I must recognize, as I believe the people will recognize, that the smaller States will see in that kind of a popular vote the taking away from them of their sovereignty. I am satisfied that great difficulty would be experienced in obtaining approval of three-fourths of the States for such a procedure.

Mr. President, I have proposed an amendment which I believe would abolish the electoral college and the old idea, which some persons call the horse-and-buggy idea, of the right of an elector to vote other than the way the people in his State instructed him to vote. I believe we should move forward and have a better system.

I ask that there be inserted at this place in my remarks the amendment to which I refer.

There being no objection, the amendment proposed by Mr. FERGUSON was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 2, line 18, after "election", insert "or a subsequent election provided for in this paragraph."

On page 3, beginning with line 4, strike through line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The person having the greatest number of votes cast for President in a State shall be credited with the total number of the electoral votes of such State; except that, if no person may be credited with such electoral votes by reason of a tie in the number of votes cast for President, a subsequent election for President shall be held in such State at such time as the Congress shall direct. The person having a majority of the whole number of such electoral votes for President shall be President. If no person has such a majority, then from the two persons having the highest numbers of electoral votes for President the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a majority of the combined membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives and a majority of the votes of the Members voting, each having one vote, shall be necessary for a choice."

On page 3, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following:

"The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have developed upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them."

On page 3, beginning with line 20, strike out all down to and including line 22 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution, the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, and section 4 of the twentieth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed."

Mr. FERGUSON. The amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Michigan seeks to preserve the reform features whose results can be ascertained, and to remove those which are based on purely speculative consequences.

The pending resolution seeks to eliminate the electoral college. I think that should be done, as my amendment will demonstrate.

Second, the resolution seeks to remedy the situation which occurs when an election is cast into the House of Representatives, where a vote is taken by States and without regard to popular will. I accept that purpose, but I propose to do so in a manner which I believe would protect the best interests of the Nation.

The Lodge resolution would remedy the situation by completely bypassing a congressional referendum. It does so by eliminating the requirement that a candidate must have a majority of the electoral vote and substituting a mere plurality requirement.

The amendment offered by the junior Senator from Michigan would remedy the situation by preserving the majority rule and by providing that whenever a candidate fails to receive a majority of electoral votes, the House and Senate shall sit in joint session and vote individually upon the candidates. The joint session would correspond in numbers to the number of electoral votes and would more positively reflect popular will than would the existing voting procedure which is limited to ballots by States. In other words, every State would have the total number of votes that would equal the number of its Senators and Representatives. There can be no doubt that on such an important occasion every Senator and every Representative would be in his seat, and there would be a vote of all those who were actually able to be in their seats, so that there would be a majority of the 531 Members.

My amendment would eliminate completely the provision for proportional counting of electoral votes and its certain invitation to the rise of multiple parties.

I cannot too strongly emphasize to the Senate and the people the desirability of preventing or discouraging the rise of multiple parties, because they would constitute a curse coming down upon this great Nation. Think of the situation in Greece. The Greek people are trying to solve their problems; but in their coming election there will be 86 different parties, resulting in coalitions to the point where it will be impossible to place responsibility. In America it has been 2-party responsibility which has protected the stability of our political system.

I submit that the proposals of the junior Senator from Michigan would cure the great bulk of the weaknesses in the present elective system, and would not depart into experiments laden with threats to the stability of our political system which are inherent in Senate Joint Resolution 2.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois, the distinguished majority leader [Mr. LUCAS] has offered an amendment to the Lodge resolution which provides that a candidate must receive 40 percent of the electoral votes instead of a mere plurality. .

It also provides that should no candidate receive 40 percent of the electoral vote, a constitutional majority of a joint session of the Congress shall elect a candidate.

The proposal does not affect the proportional counting of electoral votes provided in Senate Joint Resolution 2.

This is a refinement of the plurality requirement. As such it is a recognition of my argument that proportional counting as provided in Senate Joint Resolution 2 is likely to invite splinter parties. The proposal is merely to set up a minimum requirement for their strength. In other words, the distinguished Senator from Illinois, by his amendment, says that, in his opinion, the passage of the resolution and the adoption of the constitutional amendment it proposes would cause the splintering of parties and the splintering of responsibility.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted to the Senator from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I allot to myself five additional minutes.

The undeniable fact is that 40 percent is still a mere plurality and is short of a majority.

The argument against this proposition was succinctly covered in the debate on the Senate floor in 1934. As I have recounted before, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, the late Senator Norris, had proposed an election reform which in the first instance embodied the proportional counting scheme. That feature of the proposal was eliminated in committee. As it came from the committee the proposal contained a provision quite similar to that of the Senator from Illinois, that a candidate be required to have 35 percent of the electoral vote. On the floor Senator Norris moved to have the provision stricken out and a majority requirement substituted. He recognized that any provision for a mere percentage of the electoral vote, instead of a majority, would wreck the whole political system of America. He recognized that provision was not being made for popular vote. Oh, yes, we can shout and say we are for popular vote. I have heard that said on the floor of the Senate, and that Senate Joint Resolution 2 provides for a popular vote. In truth that is not the fact.

The proponents of the joint resolution recognize the counting of two Senators and more Representatives, and the provisional voting under the unit rule, except that they divide them across State lines.

On the floor Senator Norris moved to have that 35-percent provision stricken, and a majority requirement substituted.

Senator Robinson asked Senator Norris at that point:

The Senator has become convinced that it is better not to permit an election by popular vote of what may be termed a minority candidate.

Senator Norris, true liberal that he was, repudiated his earlier proposal by answering simply, "That is true." It cannot be said that Senator Norris was thinking only in terms of horse-and-buggy days. He had looked at both sides of the issue and made his decision in terms of what he considered best for the national interest.

Mr. President, any proposal which requires less than a majority is an invitation to minority elections. By opening the door further to multiple parties, with a proportional voting scheme, their intrusion is inevitable.

In brief, Mr. President, the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] affects only one of the two principal objections I have recorded against Senate Joint Resolution 2, and that only partially. It modifies the plurality requirement, but in that respect goes only part way, for it leaves a requirement still considerably short of a majority. It does not touch at all the second evil of Senate Joint Resolution 2, the proportional counting scheme, which is certain to enter a wedge into the two-party system and introducing the curse of multiple parties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted the Senator has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to modify my substitute. I ask that beginning with line 14, page 2, everything be stricken out after the word "have," down to line 18, and that there be substituted the words "such qualifications as shall be prescribed by the Congress."

I also ask unanimous consent that on page 4, line 24, after the word "have," there be stricken out the words "the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature," and that there be substituted therefor the words "such qualifications as shall be prescribed by the Congress."

I also ask unanimous consent to have the entire section 7, which sets forth what should be done in case of a tie, entirely eliminated, and that on page 7 the figure "8" be changed to "7," and the figure "9" be changed to "8."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will send his proposed changes to the desk, they will be noted.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am offering the substitute because I am conscientiously and firmly convinced that the American people ought to have the right to vote for President and Vice President of the United States by direct vote. Senate Joint Resolution 2 does not so provide. It merely abolishes the electoral college, as such, in name, but as a matter of fact the people themselves still would not be voting directly for President and Vice President.

Mr. President, we elect our school boards, we elect the mayors of our towns, by direct vote of the people. We elect the Governors of the States, the Members of the House of Representatives, and United States Senators, by direct vote of the people, and I know of no reason why we should not elect the President of the United States by direct vote of the people.

The pending measure, Senate Joint Resolution 2, does not eliminate political games. A group of Republicans a few months before election could still get together in a smoke-filled room and nominate some man whom the people of the country did not want. A few days later the Democrats could meet and nominate another man of the same character. Then the big business interests, which had nominated those two men, neither of whom was desired by the rank and file of the people of America, would proceed to campaign for the men they had nominated. The only choice the people would have would be to vote for one or the other.

Under my substitute any man or woman who desired to run as a candidate for President of the United States could do so. There could be a direct primary in June, and whoever was the high candidate in the Republican Party or in the Democratic Party would be the nominee of the party, just as is done in the case of governors at the present time. Then in the month of November the two men chosen by the rank and file of the people would be the two candidates, with the result that the people would have nominated in a primary election the Democrat or the Republican they would choose to be President.

Mr. President, that is not the only provision of the substitute. It provides also that an independent group, if they could get one-half of 1 percent of all the people who voted in the last presidential election, could nominate a man to run independently.

I ask, Mr. President, is it not true that in the last election, and in the election 4 years before that, those in America who were opposed to war had absolutely no chance to vote for a candidate who shared that opposition? Some may say there was no interest in the question, but I remember that when Burton K. Wheeler spoke in Los Angeles, 108,000 people attended the meeting where he spoke. It was a meeting called by those who were opposed to the United States entering World War II.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted the Senator from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I merely say, in conclusion, that I hope my substitute will prevail.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] does not seem to be on the floor at the moment.

To summarize what I have previously said, the heart of Senate Joint Resolution 2 lies in two provisions:

First. Division of a State's electoral votes among candidates on the basis of their popular votes, allowing each candidate to total up his shares regardless of State lines. This substitutes a sharing system for the present unit system, but it does not provide for the popular election of President as is provided in the substitute of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Second. Substitution of a plurality instead of majority requirement in the election of the President.

The Senator from Massachusetts and I agree on abolishing the electoral college, but we differ sharply on what are likely to be the consequences of the two radical changes I have mentioned, which he would make in our political system. My views can be stated briefly in five points.

First. Dividing up a State's electoral votes among all candidates would result in multiple parties. The present unit rule discourages the growth of minority parties. They are forced to work with either one of the two major parties. Senate Joint Resolution 2 gives them the incentive and machinery to preserve their identity, to build up their strength, as they wait for the day to take over. In time, the two-party system would be destroyed. It would foster and stimulate those people who have a single issue and desire to create a political party representing a single issue.

Mr. President, as I have stated before, and I cannot emphasize it too strongly, for it represents the great value of the two-party system, the existence of the two parties causes to be shaded into one or the other of the parties various, diverse views, multiple enough to represent the ideas of the great mass of the citizens. It is under such a melting process that there is developed a great political party which has been able to stand the test and elect Senators and Representatives through these many years. Yes, Mr. President, on occasions we have had 70 other parties spring up. But they have lasted for only a very short time because of the necessity for persons holding various opinions to go into a great party where they can be represented in a national election and on a national basis.

The South would be the first section of the country invaded by radical minorities, and the North would soon be infected. Even if Democrats are blind to this fate, Republicans cannot afford to let it happen, because multiple parties are against the national interest.

Second. Multiple parties at the presidential level would soon build up slates at the congressional level. Eventually they would demand proportional representation in Congress, on boards and commissions, in the courts. The end result will be bloc and coalition government with all its dangers. We shall not be blind to what is happening in other countries because of coalition governments. We should be warned that a real danger would exist even here in America if we were to have a coalition government.

Third. Under Senate Joint Resolution 2, States lose immediately their control over their electoral vote. Small States would be reduced to zero influence, and the voice of large States would be cut in two, with no recognition for their weight in population, taxation, and economic importance. We are not dealing only with a method of counting votes but with a complicated political system.

Those were the things which caused our forefathers to look so carefully at this thing and act as they did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). The time which the Senator from Michigan has allotted to himself has expired.

Mr. FERGUSON. I allot to myself five more minutes.

Fourth. Eventually all Presidential elections would be federalized. The Constitution cannot guarantee a candidate a share in electoral votes, without following through to guarantee him the right to get on State ballots, so that he can have the means of getting those votes. Either by Supreme Court decision or by minority pressures, the States would be forced ultimately to surrender their control of elections to the Federal Government.

Fifth. The plurality provision will result in more, not less, minority Presidents. Senator LODGE says plurality elections now prevail in States and localities. This is true only on the surface, not in substance. With few exceptions, pluralities always result in a final choice between the two major parties, because the present system discourages minority parties. Third parties are small and of little account. Even if the Senator from Massachusetts were correct, plurality winners are confined to single States and small localities. The Nation at large is not endangered by a minority choice. His resolution makes minority Presidents a constant possibility on the national level. A candidate with as low as 30 percent of the vote could become President. Under the proposed amendment to the Lodge resolution the percentage would be 40 percent.

I do not think this would be good for the Nation. Therefore I would urge that the so-called Lodge resolution be defeated.

Mr. President, because it is so appropriate to the present moment, I wish to read now from a speech delivered by Abraham Lincoln:

> But we must not promise what we ought not, lest we be called on to perform what we cannot; we must be calm and moderate, and consider the whole difficulty, and determine what is possible and just. We must not be led by excitement and passion to do that which our sober judgments would not approve in our cooler moments. We have higher aims; we will have more serious business than to dally with temporary measures.

Mr. President, I repeat the words "We must not promise what we ought not, lest we be called on to perform what we cannot."

We should not promise the people of the United States that the proposed constitutional amendment will not bring vast and undesired changes simply because we assume they will not. We should not tell the people we will give to them the right to vote directly for President, or say that the voter in Michigan is on the same basis as the voter in Mississippi or in New York, because that is not the fact. We would still retain the unit rule, dividing it after it crosses the State line, but retaining the unit rule vote.

Mr. President, this is not a measure which would provide for a popular election of President of the United States, and the public should not be misled into believing that it is such a measure.

Does the Senator from Massachusetts wish to speak at this time?

Mr. LODGE. I am saving some time for myself to conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts controls 15 minutes. The Senator from Michigan controls 25.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I wish to oppose the joint resolution, principally on the one ground, that it would give a tremendously disproportionate weight to one-party States. It may perhaps be possible to change the situation in one-party States; but, as a general proposition, it is very difficult to change a one-party county or a one-party State, and whether it can be done is entirely conjectural. A one-party State would have infinitely greater weight under the so-called Lodge resolution than it has under the present system.

Under the present system it is said that the State of New York, for instance, with a large vote which has to go all one way or another, has a somewhat disproportionate influence. I think that can be argued. But certainly it is not so disproportionate as the result would be if the constitutional amendment were adopted, by reason of the number of one-party States in the United States. Adoption of the constitutional amendment, which is held forth as being a measure providing for return to popular vote, will do exactly the opposite thing. In view of the present conditions in the United States, it is far more likely that under the proposed method we may elect a President who has actually a minority of the popular vote than it is under the system now in operation.

I quite agree that the present system is not ideal. I would be perfectly willing to have the problem studied and try to work it out in the best possible manner, but certainly the amendment proposed by the joint resolution would not accomplish the purpose intended. We should not hastily amend the Constitution of the United States, for such an amendment will probably remain in force for another 150 years, as the Constitution itself has. If we are going to amend it at all we ought to endeavor to make it just as perfect as possible.

Personally I would be willing under some circumstances to vote for a resolution based simply on the popular vote. Certainly that would be logical and reasonably defensible. I believe that the alternatives proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] have one fault. They leave to the State the determination of the number of electors, being the same number as under the State legislature procedure. That means, for instance, that a State would get much greater weight in a straight popular vote by reducing the age from 21 to 18 and adding a number of electors.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. That has been amended.

Mr. TAFT. Then I may vote for the Senator's amendment. There is that possible fault. There is a logical basis for it, but this system is not a system of popular vote.

The clearest evidence that such cases not only could occur but that they have actually occurred appears on page 179 of the record. There it is shown that in the 1900 election William McKinley had a total popular vote of 7,219,000, and Bryan had a total popular vote of 6,358,000. That gave McKinley 52.8 percent of the popular vote. Yet under the Lodge proposal Bryan would have been elected in 1900, although he got only 47.2 percent of the popular vote.

So certainly this is not the ideal system. The result I have described can happen, and it would have happened, in my opinion, if this system had been in effect. In the case to which I have referred, under the electoral-vote system, McKinley got 292 electoral votes and Bryan 155. Under the proposed amendment, McKinley would have gotten 214 electoral votes and Bryan 218.

I have made calculations, which I shall ask to have inserted in the RECORD, with relation to the effect of the different systems.

In analyzing the election of 1900 as it would have counted under the Lodge resolution, we find that Bryan had an electoral majority in approximately 16 States. Of those, 11 States were in the extreme South. He got 42.8 percent of the electoral votes in those States. He got 4½ percent in the five or six States he carried in the North. McKinley, from all the other States together, got only 41.8 percent.

In other words, certain States have a tremendous electoral vote majority. Take a State like Mississippi. In that election Mississippi had a weight of seven electoral votes, whereas the State of Ohio, which was McKinley's home State, had a weight of only 1.6 electoral votes.

It can be clearly seen what would happen today in the case of Ohio. We have a total of 25 electoral votes. If we carry the State of Ohio by 125,000, we are doing a pretty good job. As a matter of fact, the vote is so close that Dewey actually carried the State of Ohio in 1944 by 12,000 votes out of 3,000,000 votes, and he lost it in 1948 by 7,000 votes. I do not know the Willkie majority but it was not so large as 125,000. In that case those votes would be divided—13 Republican and 12 Democratic. We would get a weight of one vote in the electoral college.

Take the State of Georgia. If we run through the record of votes in Georgia, the comparison is much more than 3 to 1. Assuming that it is 3 to 1, Georgia has 12 electoral votes, with a population considerably less than half the population of Ohio. The vote would probably be divided 9 to 3. That means that Georgia would have a weight of six in the electoral college, or six times as much as the State of Ohio. We might conceivably have three. Our majority might go to 250,000, but it is not likely.

It is also rather interesting in that general situation to note the facts in connection with the 1940 election. Suppose the election had been conducted under the general plan of the Lodge resolution. In the electoral-college vote Mr. Roosevelt got 127 electoral votes from the 11 Southern States and 240 from the Northern States, a total of 367 votes. He got about twice as much from the South as from the North. But when we calculate the vote under the Lodge resolution we find that his majority is 77 from the Southern States and 34 from the States he carried in the North. In other words, the Southern States would have twice as much influence in the election of a President, from the Democratic standpoint, under the proposed system than they have had under the present system. That might be a highly desirable result to some.

I mention this factor only to indicate that this is not a scientific system. It is a system based on a theory which has no relation to the actual popular vote, so far as I can see, or only a very small relation. It gives a much greater influence to a one-party State. The same thing may be said of Vermont or perhaps Nebraska and Kansas, as compared with any of the larger States.

Secondly, the Lodge amendment gives much greater influence to a vote in a State which has a small vote. In other words, today, so far as the present record is concerned, anyone voting in the South under the Lodge amendment would have four times the influence that I have in voting in Ohio.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. TAFT. That is not quite true of the State of Tennessee, which has a strong Republican organization. In that respect, it has much more the character of a Northern State.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator have the percentages for all the States?

Mr. TAFT. I have a great many figures.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have the Senator put them in the RECORD.

Mr. TAFT. I intend to place in the RECORD everything I have before me.

It seems to me clear that if we are to perfect the system, we should perfect it. I would be very much in favor of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], which proposes to establish a commission to study the entire question as scientifically as possible, to see if there cannot be found a system which can be adopted by the Congress and by the States, a system which will give a direct reflection of the popular vote. If the pending joint resolution fails of passage, I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will press his resolution, because I think improvements should be made. But certainly I do not think we should step out of the frying pan into the fire. We should not step out of a situation in which some States have perhaps a little more influence than others and enter one under which other States will have much greater influence. We should not step into a situation which a voter in one State will have a great deal more influence than a voter in another State. That certainly is the condition which would arise under this joint resolution.

On the whole I think we ought to consider a long time before we give up the State unit system. Our campaigns have been conducted on a State basis. On a State basis we know what we are doing. The ultimate effect of votes on what happens in the Nation is a long way off. We have conducted our campaigns in this country on a State basis, and we have got them down to the people, where the people can consider the issues, by conducting them on a State basis. We must do it anyway. We must elect Senators, Representatives, and all the State officers on a State basis. We must carry the election by a majority if we wish to elect those officers. It seems to me that if we want to have a real campaign influence, we ought to consider a long time before we leave the State basis, if we are to consider the States at all. Of course, the joint resolution gives consideration to the States, and then adopts a system of proportional representation imposed upon the State system.

The theory that we ought to go to a system of a national majority and have a straight popular vote is perfectly sound. We can do that if we wish. But if we are to maintain the States, if the States are really to elect these officers, if we are to give each State a certain number of electoral votes based upon population, regardless of how it votes, regardless of whether it has two parties, and regardless of whether the people of the State care to vote or not, it seems to me that every campaign ought to be fought out on a State basis.

In my judgment, if the proposed commission is to consider the question, it ought to give great weight to the fact that we have established a union of States. We have always based everything on a union of independent States. All our elections are based upon the State unit. I think we would make a great mistake if we were to abandon that system, unless such a course seemed to be the only solution. Certainly I do not think we should have a hybrid cross such as would be the result of the joint resolution. The joint resolution would in no way cure the evils in the present electoral system.

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I wish to refer very briefly to an amendment which I have proposed to Senate Joint Resolution 2. The amendment deals with just one phase of the situation, namely, the desirability, as I see it, of maintaining in this country the two-party system which has worked to the advantage of freedom and to the advantage of everyone in this Republic of ours.

It seems to me that if this proposed legislation is enacted, even with the Lucas amendment included in it, it will be a tremendous inducement for a great many so-called splinter parties to develop, with the result of fragmenting to a number of small, aggressive, but highly irresponsible parties, the votes of the people of this country for President.

The joint resolution as proposed states, on page 3:

> Each person for whom votes were cast for President in each State shall be credited with such proportion of the electoral votes thereof as he received of the total vote of the electors therein for President.

Mr. President, apparently recognizing that such a provision would certainly spread the votes, in the electoral counting, among perhaps 15 or 20 candidates for President, the sponsors of the joint resolution have accepted an amendment, suggested by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], which would work in the direction of meeting that problem, because it points out that if a candidate for President shall receive less than 40 percent of the total number of electoral votes, the selection of President would then be made from among the two candidates receiving the highest numbers of votes.

The difficulty seems to me to be that such a provision would not sufficiently meet the problem, because up to the 40-percent margin, at least, in the electoral college the votes cast for every candidate for President all over the country would be counted, and that would constitute a "go" sign for sectional parties, for parties based on some local ideas or individual points of view, or on some occupational, vocational, or social consideration.

I do not think we dare tamper with the bipartisan system which has existed in this country for a century and a half and has demonstrated that it can provide a greater degree of freedom and opportunity than can either the one-party systems in the world or the multiple-party systems in Europe.

Mr. President, one of the great plagues in the world to day is the fact that so few of the countries of the world have been able to develop and maintain a two-party system. For that reason, I have offered an amendment which would meet that challenge directly by providing, on page 3, in line 9, that—

> And only the computations of the two candidates in each State having the largest percentage of the votes cast for President shall be counted in determining the total electoral votes received by each candidate.

Mr. President, under that amendment, within the States there could be as many candidates for President as the people of the States desired, and there could be as many political parties as the people of the States cared to certify; but only the two candidates receiving or registering the greatest number of votes would have their electoral votes counted at the central tabulation here in Congress. Without my amendment, I believe the Lodge amendment would operate to encourage one of the greatest dangers existing to the maintenance of our freedom, namely, the possibility that irresponsible splinter parties, which might be very aggressive, but highly irresponsible, would divide among themselves a large portion of the votes cast by the people of the country for President.

Mr. President, one reason why we have succeeded in doing what Europe has failed to do is that under the electoral college system we have not had votes chalked up for three or four or five Presidential candidates. The amendment I now propose to the joint resolution would continue the same kind of discouragement for such splinter parties; and when the final decision was reached, we would announce to the world that the decision was between candidate A, who received the greatest number of votes in the electoral counting, and candidate B, who received the next highest number of votes. We would not highlight to the world that there were also candidates C, D, E, and F, representing splinter parties, thus encouraging the development of a multiplicity of minority parties throughout this country.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the amendment I propose to the joint resolution will be adopted, in the interests of safeguarding our two-party system which would otherwise be placed in serious jeopardy should the Lodge proposal be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY].

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I do not believe I shall require that much time.

I do not rise to attempt to convince the Members of this body, but merely to state the reasons for my vote today.

I wish to state that I shall vote today in favor of the joint resolution, if it is properly amended.

I have always been opposed to the idea of the electoral college, which I think is undemocratic.

Originally I thought the joint resolution sponsored by the Senator from Massachusetts, for himself and other Senators, would tend in the direction of doing away with the electoral college. However, after giving the matter a great deal of study, I have arrived at the conclusion that the opposite would be the case.

Therefore, I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota, providing for popular election. If that amendment fails of adoption, I intend to vote against the joint resolution.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does either the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for that purpose?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand that I have 17 minutes remaining. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has 17 minutes remaining, so the Parliamentary Clerk informs the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. I believe it is customary for the proponents to close the debate. So I should like to be recognized 17 minutes before 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be a matter to be arranged between the two Senators who are to divide the time.

Mr. LODGE. I think more Senators have spoken on the side of the proponents than on the side of the opponents.

I understand that the Senator from Michigan still has 5 or 6 minutes remaining, if he desires to use them.

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not desire to use any more time at this time.

Mr. LODGE. I do not care to do anything at this time, either. But I give notice that at 17 minutes to 3 I should like to be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no discretion in that matter. That is a matter to be arranged between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LODGE. I shall wait; and in 5 minutes I shall seek recognition. I understand that under the rule I can receive recognition.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 2 minutes to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, there are some statistics to which I should like to refer, and which I should also like to have placed in the RECORD.

In the election of 1908, which was between Taft and Bryan, according to the actual result Taft won by 321 electoral votes to approximately 160. Under the Lodge joint resolution, if it had applied at that time, Taft would have won by three electoral votes, although he received 54½ percent of the total popular votes. I do not know at what point the break occurs, but, again, that is because of the excessive influence of one-party States. I should like to have those statistics placed in the RECORD.

I should also like to have printed in the RECORD the results of the elections of 1900, 1908, 1912, 1940, 1944, and 1948, as calculated under the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 2.

I should also like to have printed in the RECORD a recalculation of the election of 1944. On the assumption that Dewey received 10 percent more votes than he did in every State, the same number being deducted from the votes received by Roosevelt, Dewey then would have carried the popular vote by 780,146. He would have had 50.4 percent of the popular vote. But he would have lost the election under the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 2; Roosevelt would have won 278 to 247, a substantial majority.

I present these statistics for the RECORD to show that the joint resolution, while advanced as an effort to give greater effect to popular votes, actually will do nothing of the kind; and under present conditions it is far more likely that a "minority" President would be elected than it is under the present system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LUCAS rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Have we run out of something to do, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to recognize any Senator desiring recognition.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I should like to be recognized.

Mr. LUCAS. I am sure we would be delighted to hear from the Senator from North Dakota, in order to keep the Senate going.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does either Senator allot time to the Senator from North Dakota? [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, if I cannot get any time, I shall not talk.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it is a little unusual to find two good Republicans on the other side of the aisle who are somewhat in disagreement as to who should speak. As a general rule, all Republicans are at all times very anxious to take the floor and to speak on a moment's notice. It is somewhat strange to find such silence manifested by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FERGUSON. There is no disagreement. There merely is no agreement.

Mr. LUCAS. It is the same thing. No disagreement is no agreement, I take it. There is something wrong.

Mr. HUNT rose.

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HUNT. I should merely like to say it is a most unusual situation in the Senate of the United States when no one cares to talk. I might utilize the time by telling of the grandeur of the Teton Mountains of Wyoming. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand I have 17 minutes remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. I should first like to express my position on the amendments which are pending. I intend to support the Lucas amendment, which I think embodies the best features of the amendments proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] and by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON]. It provides that if no candidate shall receive 40 percent of the vote, then the new Congress shall vote on the two highest nominees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests, in view of the fact that 2 or 3 minutes elapsed with no volunteers, that if we overrun the time, we shall have to divide the lapsed time between the two sides.

Mr. LODGE. I still have 16 minutes, have I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. I shall vote for the Lucas amendment and oppose the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from South Carolina.

Before the war, I sponsored legislation for a direct popular election of the President, and while I have never ceased to believe that this would be a desirable change, I realized some years ago that from a practical standpoint it is utterly impossible of accomplishment, because it diminishes the relative importance of the smaller States in a Presidential election. But I would not want it to appear that I oppose the direct popular election. I shall vote for the Langer and Humphrey proposals, but I want to emphasize that my prime objective is the enactment of Senate Joint Resolution 2, which, in the light of all the facts, is by far the best solution of the problem.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio referred to the resolution of the able Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], which provides for a study of the whole question of the Presidential succession. I think evidently the Senator from Ohio was unaware of the fact that that resolution has passed the Senate and is now in the House, and that it was expressly stated in the report of the Committee on Rules and Administration that the resolution was in no sense of the word to be regarded as a substitute for or an excuse for delay on Senate Joint Resolution 2. The Senator from Ohio says the proposal embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 2 would not accurately reflect the popular vote, that it would not be an improvement over the present system in reflecting the popular vote. All I can say in response to the Senator is, in that respect, he puts himself squarely in collision with no less an authority on governmental matters than the Brookings Institution, which is on record in the hearings as saying that the adoption of the amendment would make practically impossible a situation in which a candidate having a majority of the popular vote would fail to receive a majority of the electoral votes. That is what the Brookings Institution says.

Then the Senator from Ohio speaks about the difficulty of changing the situation in a one-party State. He goes along on the theory that if a State or a county or other area has always voted a certain way in the past, it is always going to vote a certain way in the future. How anybody who observes politics in America can entertain that idea is beyond my comprehension. Massachusetts used to be a Republican State in Presidential years. New York used to be a Republican State in Presidential years. Illinois used to be a Republican State in presidential years. California used to be a Republican State in Presidential years. See what happened to them in 1932, 1936, 1940, 1944, and 1948. Can anyone say, then, there is no such thing as a change in the political habits of the American people?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. I yield once, but I will not yield oftener, because my time is limited.

Mr. TAFT. I merely want to suggest to the Senator that those States are Republican States, if the Republicans fight for them. They have not changed from Republican into Democratic States. [Laughter.]

Mr. LODGE. If they are Republican States, they have a very strange way of showing it. [Laughter.] They showed their republicanism by voting Democratic in every single election since 1932. [Laughter.] If that is the kind of republicanism which satisfies the Senator from Ohio, he is welcome to it. It is not the kind of republicanism that satisfies the junior Senator from Massachusetts. I want a better kind of republicanism than that. I want a republicanism that wins and that really gives the Democrats some competition.

Then the Senator says that if we were to take the system set forth under Senate Joint Resolution 2 and apply it backward to elections of the past, the results would be changed, and that Bryan would have been elected in 1900 instead of McKinley. Of course, it is utterly useless to take the new system here proposed and apply it backward to the scores of old games, and therefore all the figures which the Senator from Ohio so laboriously put into the RECORD are a complete and utter waste of time, because it is utterly inconceivable that if this system had been in effect people would have voted the same way. The campaigns would have been conducted differently. The issues would have been different, and probably the candidates themselves would have been different. So there is utterly no use in taking this system and applying it backward. It is like the "floogie" bird which flies backward and sees only where he has been, and does not see where he is going.

Then, the Senator suggested that if in the past the electoral votes of Ohio were split 12 and 13, then Ohio would only have 1 vote. That, however, is not at all true. Under the system proposed by this amendment to the Constitution the 12 Republican electoral votes in Ohio would be added to the Republican votes which would be obtained in other States; the 13 Democratic votes, let us say for example in Ohio, would be added to the Democratic votes in other States. They would not merely cancel each other and leave the State with but one vote. It would mean that the people of Ohio would get representation all the way, and the people who are in the minority in Ohio would have their votes counted.

Mr. President, I should like to rebut the argument of the Senator from Michigan for a moment. He says:

> It would be possible for a candidate with a totalitarian philosophy to be elected President, with only 30 percent of the popular and electoral vote, even though bitterly opposed by 70 percent of the people voting for three or four other candidates.

This is exactly as much of a possibility under the present system as it would be under Senate Joint Resolution 2. In any case, it is completely taken care of and the possibility is eliminated by the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

The Senator from Michigan says:

> A well-organized compact minority may easily prevail over scattered, divided majorities.

This is always a possibility where the majority is weak, stupid, and divided and is neither encouraged nor hindered by Senate Joint Resolution 2, as originally drawn, but it is made almost impossible by the Lucas amendment.

The Senator from Michigan says:

> We must guard against any break-down of the two-party system which has served America so well.

To this I say a hearty amen. I believe that Senate Joint Resolution 2 is the best action we can take to enhance and fortify the two-party system. If the two-party system is as good as the Senator from Michigan says it is, why does he not want to extend it to the whole country and let the people of the South have the benefit of the two-party system?

The Senator from Michigan says:

> The intention of a proportional counting system is to reflect mathematically the popular will. Such a perfect reflection is not possible under our Federal system.

It is true that a perfect mathematical reflection is impossible, but Senate Joint Resolution 2 is a vast improvement over the present system in that respect and gives a very practical and workable approximation of a mathematical reflection of the popular vote.

The Senator from Michigan says:

> By indirection, the States are required to surrender their sovereignty over the disposition of their own electoral votes.

What sovereignty, I should like to ask? Look at the elector in Tennessee, whose constituents voted Democratic, but who went ahead and voted the Dixiecrat ticket, simply because it suited his purpose to do so, and because he was not legally bound to do otherwise. If it is possible to have one of these "free wheeling" electors, or two or three of them, to vote as they please, why is it not possible to have 200 or 300? The whole system of electing the President would then be subverted.

The Senator from Michigan says:

> The point I wish to emphasize however is that most of the arguments offered in these hearings are speculative because it cannot be known in advance what changes will be worked in voting habits and political parties and in the conduct of Presidential elections.

Obviously, all arguments regarding future legislation are speculative. We, who are sponsoring this amendment, are frank enough to admit it. We also add the thought that the whole Constitution of the United States rested on a guess as to the future and on a speculation as to human nature. Moreover, we wish to underline the fact that the opponents of Senate Joint Resolution 2 are resting their whole case on a speculation—the speculation that political currents do not change.

Their whole position is that what has happened in the past will happen in the future. If history teaches us anything, it is that history does not repeat itself.

The Senator from Michigan goes on to say:

> Those who favor proportional sharing of the States' electoral vote emphasize the point that it will eliminate or at least minimize the possibility of a President being elected without a majority or even a plurality of the popular vote. This is an absurdity.

Mr. President, he may consider it an absurdity; but, if he does, he will find himself in collision with the Brookings Institution, which stated in a letter dated May 27, 1948, that Senate Joint Resolution 2 "will practically eliminate the chance that a President will receive a majority of electoral votes in spite of the fact that his opponent polled a majority of the popular vote."

That, I think, is pretty conclusive evidence.

The Senator from Michigan says:

> I firmly believe that proportionate sharing of electoral votes is a direct encouragement to the growth of multiple parties.

It is my firm belief that the reverse is true. Under the present system, the splinter party has the opportunity of influencing the result. Remember what happened in the last election when the Wallace party was so influential that it, in effect, threw two States to Governor Dewey. That would be utterly impossible under the proposed system. The thing that makes a party grow in power and influence is results, and a third party could not achieve results under the system which I propose. To me the small electoral-vote credit is not a significant thing when it is stacked up against the fact that no longer would any small party be able to throw the whole vote of a great State.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we have here a great opportunity to do something negative and something positive. Negatively, we protect the American people against many dangers which are inherent in the present system. As someone once said, the electoral college is like the vermiform appendix in the human body. Ordinarily it does not cause any trouble, but every now and then it can become infected and expose the whole body to political peritonitis. There are pitfalls which could create a situation in which we would not know who was our President, and the right of a man to be President would be in doubt. It would cause great turmoil and unrest in America.

On the positive side it would remove the obstacle which now stands in the way of the development of the two-party system in America. I say to my fellow Republicans that they must never let the impression go out to the country that they do not trust the voters. They must never let the impression go out that the success of the Republican Party in the future hinges on some kind of a trick or machine or device. I say we should be willing to meet the Democrats in fair competition, and if we win it will be because we deserve to win. I think we can win only on that basis. If we turn our backs on this proposal because we think it will hurt the Republican Party or because we think that the same thing will happen in 1950 or 1960 as happened in 1916 and 1920, of course, the people will lose confidence in the party.

Mr. President, I conclude with this word: In his criticism of the proposal the Senator from Michigan said in his concluding remarks that we should recommit the resolution for further study.

Mr. President, it does not need to be recommitted to any committee of the Congress, because it has been studied in the Congress for 102 years. I would say, Mr. President, let us recommit it for study to the State legislatures. Let us send it to the 48 State legislatures. Certainly it is an issue on which the members of the State legislatures have a right to pass. So I plead with Senators to pass this resolution and let it go to the States, so that the people can decide for themselves whether they want to extend the two-party system in America.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has 2 minutes.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, this is a very serious question. The Senate should not send to the legislatures anything which it has not perfected. The proposed constitutional amendment cannot be amended after the joint resolution has been passed. The legislatures cannot amend it. They must pass on it as it is presented to them.

I want to say, again, Mr. President, that the resolution does not give to the people of the United States the right to a popular vote for the President of the United States. No one is contending that the Republican Party is trying to manipulate the machinery in order that it may receive more votes. What we want to do is to see that the people at some time get the right to vote in popular elections for the President and Vice President of the United States. The mere fact that we have crossed one system with another system and have a hybrid does not give to the people of the United States the right to vote.

Therefore I say, again, that under Senate Concurrent Resolution 14—the Green resolution—time can be spent on perfecting a proposal, so that when a proposed constitutional amendment does go to the State legislative bodies the people will be able to speak clearly on this great question. If the joint resolution is to be passed, it should be perfected as proposed in the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	Morse
Anderson	Hill	Mundt
Benton	Hoey	Myers
Brewster	Holland	Neely
Bricker	Humphrey	O'Conor
Bridges	Hunt	O'Mahoney

Gurney	Maybank
Hayden	Millikin

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present. The first question is on the amendment of the committee, which the clerk will state.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 9, after the word "disregarded", it is proposed to strike out "unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the word "The" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

On the 6th day of January following the election, unless the Congress by law appoints a different day not earlier than the 4th day of January and not later than the 10th day of January, the.

On page 3, line 10, beginning with the words "The person", strike out all down to and including line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The person having the greatest number of electoral votes for President shall be President, if such number be at least 40 percent of the whole number of such electoral votes. If no person have at least 40 percent of the whole number of electoral votes, then from the persons having the two highest numbers of electoral votes for President the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. A majority of the votes of the combined authorized membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall be necessary for a choice.

On page 3, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following:

The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

On page 3, beginning with line 20, strike out all down to and including line 2? and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution, the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, and section 4 of the twentieth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois desire to have his amendments voted on en bloc? They embrace several different proposals.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask that they be voted on en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I call up my substitute, providing for a direct election by the people of President and Vice President. I ask that it be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read in full?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert the following:

That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, be nominated and elected as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 2. The official candidates of political parties for President and Vice President shall be nominated at a primary election by direct vote of the qualified voters who are members of the respective political parties in the several States. The time of such primary election shall be the same throughout the United States, and, unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different day, such primary election shall be held on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in June in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of President and Vice President. Persons voting in primaries for candidates for President and Vice President in each State shall have such qualifications as shall be prescribed by the Congress.

"The names which shall appear in each of the States on the primary ballots for candidates of the respective political parties shall be only of those persons who shall have filed petitions at the seat of the Government of the United States with the Secretary of State. Such petitions shall be valid only if filed at least 60 days prior to the day of primary election and if signed by qualified voters in any or all of the several States, equal in number to at least one-tenth of 1 percent of the total number of popular votes cast throughout the United States for all candidates for President (or, in the case of the primary election first held after the ratification of this article, for electors of President and Vice President) in the most recent previous Presidential election.

"SEC. 3. Within 30 days after such primary election, the chief executive of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons of each political party, for whom votes were cast, and the number of votes for each such person, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted under the seal of such State to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the Secretary of State, who shall open all certificates and count the votes. The person receiving the greatest aggregate number of popular votes of any party for candidate for President shall be the official candidate of such party, throughout the United States, for President; and the person receiving the greatest aggregate number of popular votes of any party for candidate for Vice President shall be the official candiate of such party, throughout the United States, for Vice President.

"SEC. 4. In the event of the death or resignation of the official candidate of any political party for President, the person nominated by such political party for Vice President shall be the official candidate of such party for President. In the event of the death or resignation of the official candidate of any political party for Vice President, a national committee of such party shall designate a candidate for Vice President, who shall then be deemed the official candidate for Vice President of such party, but in choosing such candidate the vote shall be taken by States, the delegation from each State having one vote. A quorum for such purpose shall consist of a delegate or delegates from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all States shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 5. The electoral-college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished. The President and Vice President shall be elected by the people of the several States as shall be determined by direct vote of the qualified voters at a general election. The time of such election in each State shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different day, such election shall be held on the first Wednesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. The voters in each State shall vote directly for President and Vice President and shall have such qualifications as shall be prescribed by Congress. The names of candidates officially nominated in primaries as herein provided, and in addition the names of any independent candidates, shall appear in every State upon the official ballot for the offices of President and Vice President, but names of any such independent candidates shall so appear only following the filing with the Secretary of State of the United States, at least 60 days prior to the day of the election, of petitions signed by qualified voters in any or all of the several States, equal in number to at least one-half of 1 percent of the total number of popular votes cast throughout the United States for all candidates for President.

"SEC. 6. Within 30 days after such election, the chief executive of each State shall make distinct lists of all persons receiving votes for President and all persons receiving votes for Vice President, and the number of votes cast in such State for each, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted under the seal of such State to the seat of the Government of the United States directed to the President of the Senate. The Congress shall be in session on the 6th day of January, or if such day shall fall on Sunday on the 7th day of January, and on that day the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest aggregate number of popular votes for President shall be President, and the person having the greatest aggregate number of popular votes for Vice President shall be Vice President. No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"SEC. 7. The Congress shall have power to provide by appropriate legislation for methods of determining any dispute or controversy that may arise in the counting and canvassing of votes for President and Vice President in any such primary or general election. The places and manner of holding such primary or general election shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to prevent fraud and corrupt practices in connection with such primary or general elections.

"SEC. 8. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States as provided in the Constitution."

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to terms of office of President, and providing for nomination of candidates for President and Vice President, and for election of such candidates, by popular vote."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER].

Mr. LANGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is absent on public business, and if present would vote "yea."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—31

So, Mr. LANGER's amendment in the nature of a substitute for the joint resolution was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States, as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of 4 years, and together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term, be elected as provided in this Constitution.

"The electoral college system of electing the President and Vice President of the United States is hereby abolished. The President and the Vice President shall be elected by a direct vote of the people of the United States, and the choice of the people of each State for President and Vice President shall be determined at a general election held in such State.

"The Congress shall determine the time of such election, which shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless otherwise determined by the Congress, such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and the Vice President. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"SEC. 2. Within 30 days after such election, or at such time as the Congress shall direct, each State shall make distinct lists of all persons receiving votes for President and all persons receiving votes for Vice President, and the number of votes cast in such State for each, which lists shall be signed, certified, and transmitted sealed to the seat of Government of the United States directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all certificates and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President.

"The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President shall be Vice President. No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"SEC. 3. In the event that it is shown by such certificates that the two or more persons having the highest number of votes have also received an equal number of all the votes cast for President, then, from these persons the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President, each Member of the House of Representatives having one vote. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Representatives, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon that body, before the 20th day of January next following, then the Vice President elect shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

"SEC. 4. In the event that it is shown by such certificates that the two or more persons having the highest number of votes have also received an equal number of all the votes cast for Vice President, then, from these persons the Senate shall choose the Vice President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

"SEC. 5. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution and the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 6. This article shall take effect on the 30th day of January following its ratification.

"SEC. 7. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 7 years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. LANGER, and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is absent on public business, and if present would vote "yea."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 63, as follows:

So Mr. HUMPHREY's amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I call up the amendment which I have at the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the period and add the following language:

And only the computations of the two candidates in each State having the largest percentage of the votes cast for President shall be counted in determining the total electoral votes received by each candidate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT and other Senators requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] is unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is absent on public business.

I announce further that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] would vote "nay."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 67, as follows:

So Mr. MUNDT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I have on the desk an amendment which I ask be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed on page 2, line 18, after "election" to insert "or a subsequent election provided for in this paragraph."

On page 3, beginning with line 4, strike out through line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The person having the greatest number of votes cast for President in a State shall be credited with the total number of the electoral votes of such State; except that, if no person may be credited with such electoral votes by reason of a tie in the number of votes cast for President, a subsequent election for President shall be held in such State at such time as the Congress shall direct. The person having a majority of the whole number of such electoral votes for President shall be President. If no person has such a majority, then from the two persons having the highest numbers of electoral votes for President the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a majority of the combined membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives and a majority of the votes of the Members voting, each having one vote, shall be necessary for a choice.

On page 3, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following:

The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate and House of Representatives may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

On page 3, beginning with line 20, strike out all down to and including line 22 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. Paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, article II, of the Constitution, the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution, and section 4 of the twentieth article of amendment to the Constitution, are hereby repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that two of the provisions of the Senator's amendment are identical with the provisions included in the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois, which was agreed to previously.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I ask to withdraw those two provisions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, without the provisions which the Senator wishes to withdraw, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, read as follows: On page 2 line 18, after "election", insert "or a subsequent election provided for in this paragraph."

On page 3, beginning with line 4, strike out through line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The person having the greatest number of votes cast for President in a State shall be credited with the total number of the electoral votes of such State; except that, if no person may be credited with such electoral votes by reason of a tie in the number of votes cast for President, a subsequent election for President shall be held in such State at such time as the Congress shall direct. The person having a majority of the whole number of such electoral votes for President shall be President. If no person has such a majority, then from the two persons having the highest number of electoral votes for President, the Senate and the House of Representatives sitting in joint session shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. A quorum for this purpose shall consist of a majority of the combined membership of the Senate and the House of Representatives and a majority of the votes of the Members voting, each having one vote, shall be necessary for a choice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], as modified.

Mr. FERGUSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is absent on public business, and if present would vote "nay."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] is absent by leave of the Senate. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa would vote "nay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum being present, more than two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, Senate Joint Resolution 2 is passed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. LUCAS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, as previously announced, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to a call of the calendar, starting with the first order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator mean the consideration of measures to which there is no objection?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar.

DEMONSTRATION OF PUBLIC LIBRARY SERVICE—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 130) to provide for the demonstration of public-library service in areas without such service or with inadequate library facilities was announced as first in order.

Mr. TAFT. Over.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. TAFT. If the Senator desires to make a speech, I think I would prefer to make mine first, if I may. I withhold my objection.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will, I shall appreciate it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is proceeding under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. HILL. I regret that the Senator from Ohio has exercised his right to object to the consideration of the bill and its passage at this time. The bill was reported at the last session of the Congress. It was the first bill reported by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare when the Eighty-first Congress convened a year ago last month, in January 1949. It has been on the calendar during all this time, some 12 months. I merely wish to give notice that I shall seek the very first opportunity possible to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill, in order that the Senate may consider it and may have an opportunity to pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I should like to state my reason for objecting to the bill. This is another State-aid bill. It would move the Federal Government into the library field. I have supported a fair number of Federal-State aid bills, but it seems to me that such legislation should not be enacted unless the need is absolutely clear and absolutely proved.

If I remember correctly, the bill under discussion provides for an annual grant of $40,000 of Federal money to every State. If States are not able to provide $40,000, it seems to me the assistance should not be given by the Federal Government. It is a trivial matter, but it moves the Federal Government into a new field of activity. It is another extension of bureaucratic influence to which I think most people are opposed. From time to time when projects become of tremendous importance and the need becomes great I believe we should, and properly do, move into the field of Federal aid to States, but it does seem to me that the need should be clear beyond any question of doubt before we assume an additional Federal obligation, no matter how small.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being heard, the bill will go over.

BILLS AND OTHER MEASURES PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 206) relating to the immigration status of the lawful wives and children of Chinese-treaty merchants was announced as next in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 45) for the relief of the owners and operators of certain gold mines which were closed or the operations of which were curtailed by War Production Board Limitation Order L–208 was announced as next in order.

Mr. DONNELL. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The Chair would suggest that Senators who object to bills identify themselves to the Chair. That is the orderly way in which to proceed.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the objection to Senate bill 110, Calendar No. 76, was made by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thanks the Senator from Missouri for making that announcement.

The bill (S. 734) to provide for the appointment and compensation of counsel for impoverished dependents in certain criminal cases in the United States district courts was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, that is the bill which will be considered on Thursday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1946) to establish a permanent National Commission on Intergovernmental Relations was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection of the Senator from Illinois, the bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) to reduce expenditures in Government for the fiscal year 1950 consistent with the public interest was announced as next in order.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am constrained to ask that that joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 3946) to promote the national defense and to contribute to more effective aeronautical research by authorizing professional personnel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to attend accredited graduate schools for research and study was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill is identical with Senate bill 1393, to which objection was made, and which was passed over; so House bill 3946 will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1498) to amend the Natural Gas Act, approved June 21, 1938, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object and ask that the bill be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware objects. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF UNEMPLOYMENT ALLOWANCE BENEFITS TO SERVICEMEN—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1741) to extend the unemployment allowance benefits of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 for a period of 2 years was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On request of the Senator from Kansas, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas withhold his objection, to allow an explanation of that bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I withhold my objection so the Senator from Florida may make an explanation of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, this bill was reported by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare as a modification of the President's proposal. The President recommended that the unemployment compensation available to veterans be extended for another 12 months' period, because a great many veterans who were coming out of school under the GI bill of rights, because of the dislocation of employment which has occurred in many parts of the country, were actually in need of this assistance.

All the bill does is to make those benefits which veterans previously might have drawn, available to them if they need them now.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that the consideration of this measure resulted in affording some factual data to refute some of the unfair criticisms levelled against the veterans. Only about 7 percent of the veterans altogether drew the allowances they might have drawn, and only about 50 percent applied for any benefits whatsoever.

But the thing I should like to emphasize is that under this bill the veteran would have to draw the benefits available under State law first before he could draw any Federal compensation or assistance whatever. Then, of course, if he should not draw from the State sufficient to make the amount $20 a month, in case he is unemployed, then he could draw the difference from the Federal program.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The law has expired now for a period of more than 6 months. There has been no particular complaint about that, has there?

Mr. PEPPER. I would not say there has been no particular complaint about it. I think a great many veterans have suffered the same disadvantage that any unemployed man suffers. They have not marched on Washington, and I am glad they have not. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that a great many veterans in the country have during that course of time been unemployed, and have not had these benefits available to them.

The bill does not propose a permanent extension of the program; merely an extension for a 12 months' period as recommended by the President. It must also be remembered that the first payments must come under the State laws, and that State standards would apply. That is, if under the State law one had to remain unemployed for a week before he could draw anything, that principle would apply, whereas it did not apply under the previous Federal legislation.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not true that the law expired 6 months ago and that no payments have been made for the past 6 months?

Mr. PEPPER. The law expired at the end of the last fiscal year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CLAIMS OF AMERICAN NATIONALS AGAINST FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 4406) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of the Government of the United States on its own behalf and on behalf of American nationals against foreign governments was announced as next in order.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a short time?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I will gladly withhold my objection.

Mr. GREEN. I regret very much that objection is made. The bill would make it possible for the claimants against Yugoslavia to get their share of the sums agreed upon between the two Governments toward settlement of the differences. The bill was passed by the House of Representatives. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Hearings were held, and I was directed by the committee to report the bill favorably, which I did. It has been on the calendar since last July.

The amount involved in the settlement, $17,000,000, is in the hands of the United States Government and ready to be paid over. The claimants, American citizens whose property was taken, many of whom are in distressing circumstances, are urging that they be allowed to receive their share. The State Department is very anxious to pay it. It seems too bad that they cannot receive their money. Objection has been made previously, and is now made again. I wish that some basis for the objection might be stated, because I have not heard what it is.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I sincerely regret that the Senator from New Jersey still feels constrained to ask that the bill go over until the next call of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island that if the bill is not passed on the next call of the calendar, I will accommodate the distinguished Senator and the Committee on Foreign Relations by moving to have it considered at an early date.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I should like to add one further thought. Our Government has an interest in this money. If the settlement made by a foreign government for war claims is not carried out, it will be very difficult for the State Department to negotiate other settlements with other governments. If these agreements cannot be carried through when once they are negotiated, we shall be in considerable difficulty.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, it is very apparent that we are not going to make any progress with the call of the calendar. We are now on the fourth page of bills, page 9 of the calendar, and not one bill has been passed. I proposed to begin the call of the calendar from the beginning primarily because of what the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] said the other day in a colloquy which I had with him, namely, that he thought a number of bills would pass on the call of the calendar without much debate.

In view of the lateness of the hour, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar be discontinued up to the point where the previous call of the calendar ended, on October 19, 1949. If we can begin on page 14 of the calendar and take up the new bills which have been reported since the convening of Congress for the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, perhaps we can make some progress in getting those bills through.

Mr. MORSE, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. LANGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks that the call of the calendar be suspended up to Calendar No. 1219, beginning where the previous call of the calendar ended.

Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, this is the first opportunity we have had in this session of Congress to make a record on the calendar in the order in which the bills appear on the calendar. I think the record should be made. I think it is only fair to those of us who are interested in bills on the calendar to find out who objects to them, so that between now and the next call of the calendar we can communicate with the objectors in respect to their objections. Therefore I feel constrained to object to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard. The next bill on the calendar will be stated.

BILLS AND OTHER MEASURES PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 2886) to provide for the killing of starlings in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 48) to amend title 28, U. S. Code, sec. 456, so as to increase to $15 per day the limit on subsistence expenses allowed to justices and judges traveling while attending court or transacting official business at places other than their official stations, and to authorize reimbursement for such travel by privately owned automobiles at the rate of 7 cents per mile was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 2432) restoring to tribal ownership certain lands upon the Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, may I inquire who objected to the bill with relation to the Colville Indian Reservation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] objected.

The bill (S. 75) authorizing the construction, operation, and maintenance of a dam and incidental works in the main stream of the Colorado River at Bridge Canyon, together with certain appurtenant dams and canals, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 806) authorizing the erection of a monument to Sacajawea, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. I object.

Mr. GURNEY. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 384) to authorize the Commissioner of Public Buildings to convey to the Temple Methodist Church, a nonprofit corporation, of San Francisco, Calif., a portion of the federally owned building known as 100 McAlister Street, San Francisco, Calif., and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 1758) to amend the Natural Gas Act approved June 21, 1938, as amended, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A Senate bill on the same subject was objected to earlier. This bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1439) to provide for assistance to State agencies administering labor laws in their efforts to promote, establish, and maintain safe workplaces and practices in industry, thereby reducing human suffering and financial loss and increasing production through safeguarding available manpower, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask when it may be possible to obtain a few minutes for the consideration of this bill. I think it would not require more than 30 minutes, or an hour, to discuss the bill and pass it.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I cannot answer the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. The only reply I can make, which I hope will satisfy him, is that I shall take it up at the next meeting of the Democratic policy committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I thank the Senator.

The bill (S. 2246) to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 5327) to continue until the close of June 30, 1950, the suspension of duties and import taxes on metal scrap, and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 62) creating a Joint Committee on Lobbying Activities, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask that the concurrent resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 4584) to provide for disposition of lands on the Cabazon, Augustine, and Torres-Martinez Indian Reservations in California, and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer. I offer an amendment, on page 3, line 3, commencing with "All wells", to strike out down to the word "district" in line 8, on page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator wait a moment, so as to permit the Chair to state the parliamentary situation? It seems that some amendments were agreed to on a prior call of the calendar. An amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is pending.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2440) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations and for other purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over. I understand that this bill is to be the order of business on Thursday.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, with relation to Calendar No. 926, Senate bill 2440, I should like to address an inquiry to the distinguished majority leader. Is this bill set for early consideration?

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to the Senator from Florida, I will say that I made the announcement earlier in the day that we would probably take this bill up on Friday of this week.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

The bill (H. R. 2166) to amend title 28, United States Code, section 456, so as to increase to $15 per day the limit on subsistence expenses allowed to justices and judges while attending court or transacting official business at places other than their official station, and to authorize reimbursement for such travel by privately owned automobiles at a rate of not exceeding 7 cents per mile was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A Senate bill on the same subject, Calendar No. 825, Senate bill 48, has already been passed over. This bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1390) to authorize the conveyance to the State of California of easements for the construction, operation, and maintenance of a toll highway crossing and approaches thereto over and across lands of the United States in the vicinity of San Francisco Bay, Calif., and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, my colleague from California [Mr. DOWNEY] has asked that this bill go over. While it is my bill, I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1596) to authorize the Postmaster General to enter into special agreements for certain switching service by railway common carriers, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the majority leader what was done with Calendar No. 596, Senate Resolution 58?

The VICE PRESIDENT. All bills and other measures called thus far on the calendar have gone over.

Mr. WHERRY. In my own time, I should like to ask what was done with Calendar No. 596, Senate Resolution 58?

Mr. LUCAS. It was passed over.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, let me inquire who objected to the present consideration of that measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asked that it go over, and it went over.

The question now is, is there objection to the present consideration of Senate bill 1596, Calendar No. 951?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey objects, and the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 17) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to certain settlers in the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation, Nev., was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico objects. The bill goes over.

The bill (H. R. 6070) to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama objects, and the bill goes over.

The bill (H. R. 5647) to prohibit the picketing of United States courts was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota objects, and the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 240) to stimulate the exploration, production, and conservation of strategic and critical ores, metals, and minerals, and for the establishment within the Department of the Interior of a Mine Incentive Payments Division, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware objects, and the bill goes over.

The bill (H. R. 133) to amend section 2 of the act approved June 20, 1936, entitled "An act to extend the benefits of the Adams Act, the Purnell Act, and the Capper-Ketchum Act to the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey objects, and the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 139) for the relief of Guilermo Chacartegui was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I understood an amendment was to be offered to the bill. If the bill is not amended, I must object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is reported without amendment. In view of the statement of the Senator from Kansas, the bill will be passed over.

THE FOREST SERVICE—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 5839) to facilitate and simplify the work of the Forest Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it is my understanding that three amendments are to be offered to this bill. I wonder whether I am correct in that understanding.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Nebraska is quite correct.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, if I may advise the minority leader, let me say there was objection to the bill the last time the calendar was called. At the present time, there are at the desk some amendments to the bill. I understand that if the amendments are adopted, they will remove the objections to the bill.

All the information which I have been able to gather indicates that the amendments are acceptable not only to the sponsors of the bill but also to the Forest Service, and we think the Forest Service would approve the bill as thus amended. Certainly I would not object to the adoption of the amendments.

The Senator from Wyoming offered the amendments, and he was one of the original objectors. Likewise, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] had raised objections, but I am quite sure his objections will be removed by the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have already stated that I wish to reserve the right to object.

In view of the explanation given by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, if the amendments can be brought before the Senate and if they are agreeable to the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Minnesota, I shall have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, first, is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah objects, and the bill goes over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon objects, and the bill goes over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to provide the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all immigrants having a legal right to permanent residence was announced as next in order.

Mr. RUSSELL. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia objects, and the joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 6073) to amend section 501 (B) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota objects, and the bill goes over.

The bill (S. 211) to amend the act entitled "An act to create the Inland Waterways Corporation for the purpose of carrying out the mandate and purpose of Congress as expressed in sections 201 and 500 of the Transportation Act, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York objects, and the bill goes over.

TREATMENT AND REHABILITATION OF YOUTH OFFENDERS — BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2609) to provide a system for the treatment and rehabilitation of youth offenders, to improve the administration of criminal justice, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I am delighted to explain the bill.

The bill comes from the committee as a clean bill, without amendment, by reason of the fact that every district judge of the Federal courts, all circuit judges, the American Bar Association, the Lawyers Guild, the national legal societies, the Grange, and the other agricultural organizations have conferred regarding the bill and are favorable to it.

The bill will cost the United States, at the beginning, not to exceed $85,000 a year. At the end of probably 3 years, the cost may increase to $185,000.

The bill will not be compulsory in any sense of the word; but it will give the judges of trial jurisdiction the right to refer the case of any prisoner under 24 years of age, who is not a habitual offender, to the Department of Justice, for complete study in the penal and other institutions of the United States now in existence, to determine whether the person is a criminal or whether the situation in his or her case is a curable one, before sentence is passed.

As I have said, the bill has the unqualified endorsement of the American Bar Association, the Lawyers Guild, the Grange, the Farm Bureau, I believe; I distinctly remember that it has the approval of the American Legion. All those organizations had representatives appear before the committee and testify in favor of the bill. Numerous judges testified in favor of the bill, including the Conference of Senior Circuit Court Judges.

For the past 6 or 8 months we have tried to have the bill acted upon. Objection has been made, but only by the Senator from Colorado, who I understand has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me that the provisions of the bill can be administered at a cost of only $85,000, and I should like to have more time to study the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill goes over.

EXEMPTION FROM TARIFF DUTIES OF CERTAIN METALLIC IMPURITIES IN TIN ORES

The bill (H. R. 2585) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide for exemption from duty of certain metallic impurities in tin ores and concentrates when such impurities are not recovered was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, may we have a brief explanation of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it is a very simple bill. It proposes to amend a section of the Tariff Act which already permits certain metallic elements in ores, which are imported in connection with gold and other materials, when those elements are impurities that are not recovered, to come in free of duty. In this case it applies only to tin. When tin is imported, if there are other mineral elements which are not recovered at all, then there is no duty imposed on the mineral elements which are brought in but not recovered as separate ores.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 5486) to amend certain provisions of the Internal Revenue Code to permit the use of additional means, including stamp machines, for payment of tax on distilled spirits, modify loss allowances for distilled spirits, for the transfer and redistillation of spirits, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LANGER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota objects, and the bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL FIREARMS ACT

The bill (H. R. 6212) to amend section 5 of the Federal Firearms Act, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUORUMS OF COMMITTEES AND SUBCOMMITTEES—AMENDMENT OF RULE 25

The resolution (S. Res. 180) to amend rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate with respect to a quorum of committees and subcommittees, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCAS. May we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, this resolution is designed to take care of the question of a quorum being present in committees when sworn testimony is to be taken and perjury may be committed. It is to prevent perjury. The committee believes it has met the problem in the proper way. The Senator will remember there is presumed to be a quorum present. That had been the usual rule, until the Supreme Court decided otherwise. Now, for the purpose of taking sworn testimony, any committee can determine the size of the committee at a hearing, and, when it is so determined, may also determine the number required to be present. Then, if a witness gives false testimony, under such circumstances, he is guilty of perjury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if his statement implies that it will be necessary to have a quorum in order to report a bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. The resolution merely has to do with the procedure before committees in order to cover the question of perjured testimony.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That subsection (3) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(3) (a) Except as provided in paragraph (b) of this subsection, each standing committee, and each subcommittee of any such committee, is authorized to fix the number of its members (but not less than one-third of its entire membership) who shall constitute a quorum thereof for the transaction of such business as may be considered by said committee, subject to the provisions of section 133 (d) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

"(b) Each standing committee, and each subcommittee of any such committee, is authorized to fix a lesser number than one-third of its entire membership who shall constitute a quorum thereof for the purpose of taking sworn testimony."

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO EMPLOYEES OF FORMER SENATOR DULLES

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 203) to pay compensation for a certain period to employees of former Senator John Foster Dulles, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration, with an amendment, in line 7, after the numerals "1949", to insert "or for so much of such time through November 30, 1949, as they were not otherwise gainfully employed," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the administrative and clerical assistants appointed by former Senator John Foster Dulles for service in his office who were carried on the Senate pay roll on November 8, 1949, salary for the period November 9, 1949, through November 30, 1949, or for so much of such time through November 30, 1949, as they were not otherwise gainfully employed, at their respective rates of salary as of November 8, 1949.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

AUTHORIZATION FOR EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANTS BY COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

The resolution (S. Res. 205) was considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by subsection (g) (2) (D) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period beginning on February 16, 1950, and ending on February 15, 1951, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution (which shall not exceed $15,000 for studying intergovernmental relations with the States and municipalities or $18,000 for studying relations with international organizations) shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, as the case may be.

AUTHORIZATION FOR EMPLOYMENT OF ASSISTANTS BY COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS IN STUDYING OPERATIONS OF GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES

The resolution (S. Res. 206) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in holding hearings, reporting such hearings, and making investigations as authorized by subsection (g) (2) (B) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, or any other duties imposed upon it, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the period beginning on February 1, 1950, and ending on January 31, 1951, to make such expenditures, and to employ upon a temporary basis such investigators, and such technical, clerical, and other assistants, as it deems advisable.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, in addition to any unexpended balance under S. Res. 52, Eighty-first Congress, first session, agreed to February 10, 1949, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee or subcommittee, as the case may be.

ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL FOR OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF THE SENATE

The resolution (S. Res. 207) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate, in equal monthly installments from January 1 to June 30, 1950, to the official reporters of Senate debates and proceedings the sum of $6,000 for the employment of additional office personnel.

JOHN W. WAGNER

The bill (S. 1059) for the relief of John W. Wagner was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John W. Wagner, of Browning, Mont., the sum of $1,000, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for compensation for certain improvements belonging to him which were located on tribal lands of the Blackfeet Reservation which were acquired by the Bureau of Reclamation on August 13, 1915: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

FRANCIS W. DODGE

The bill (S. 1146) for the relief of Francis W. Dodge was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Francis W. Dodge is hereby relieved of all liability to refund to the United States the amount of the overpayment of salary received by him, as a temporary employee in the postal service at Goffstown, N. H., from July 1, 1946, to the date when it was determined that the rate properly payable to him was 5 cents per hour less than the amount he had been receiving. In the audit and settlement of the accounts of any postmaster or other disbursing officer of the Post Office Department or postal service, the overpayment to the said Francis W. Dodge during the time specified shall be considered to have been authorized.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1677) for the relief of Erik H. Lindman was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I ask that the same course be taken in respect to this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TERM OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, OREGON

The bill (S. 2314) to provide for holding a term of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon at Eugene was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second sentence of section 117 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows: "Court shall be held at Medford, Klamath Falls, Pendleton, Portland, and Eugene."

EDWARD C. RITCHE

The bill (S. 2385) for the relief of Edward C. Ritche was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Edward C. Ritche the sum of $8,000, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for compensation for personal injuries sustained by him as a result of an accident which occurred when the automobile in which he was a passenger was struck by an automobile being driven by Byron Goodall while in the course of his employment with the United States Immigration Service in Chicago, Ill., on July 20, 1938; the said Edward C. Ritche having obtained a judgment for $8,000 against the said Byron Goodall in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, on account of such injuries: Provided, That the said Edward C. Ritche shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury satisfactory evidence of the relief of the said Byron Goodall from liability for the payment of such judgment: Provided further, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

DICK WALOOK ET AL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 587) for the relief of the estate of Dick Walook, Alfred L. Woods, and Edward Kimoktoak, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, after the word "of", to strike out "$263.75" and insert "$166.25,".

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

FREMONT RIDER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1863) for the relief of Fremont Rider, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That, upon application filed by Fremont Rider, of Middletown, Conn., within 6 months after the date of enactment of this act, the Secretary of the Army is hereby authorized and directed to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount not exceeding the sum of $10,216.52, said sum representing the amount owing to Fremont Rider from the United States as a result of the purchase by him from the United States of tracts 2 and 3 of the St. Joseph's Bay Military Reservation, Fla., such tracts having been erroneously represented by the United States as containing 1,636 acres, whereas the actual acreage as revealed by topographical maps issued recently by the United States Geological Survey is only approximately 1,100 acres: Provided, That the payment of such sum to the said Fremont Rider shall be in full settlement of all of his claims against the United States, including the use by the Government of a portion of his property at St. Joseph's Bay Military Reservation during the years 1942 through 1947, as well as the cutting of certain timber thereon.

SEC. 2. Upon receipt of the certification as authorized in section 1 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the said Fremont Rider a sum equal to the amount so certified.

SEC. 3. No part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF THE CLARK FUNERAL HOME

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2070) for the relief of the Clark Funeral Home, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "from", to strike out "his home in Hundred, W. Va.", and insert "Waynesburg Hospital, Waynesburg, Pa.", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Clark Funeral Home, Hundred, W. Va., the sum of $300, in full satisfaction of its claim against the United States for services in connection with the transportation of Monard G. Snider, a veteran, from Waynesburg Hospital, Waynesburg, Pa., to the Veterans' Administration Hospital, Hines, Ill., on February 19 and 20, 1949: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALEX MORNINGSTAR

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1423) for the relief of Alex Morningstar, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments: On page 1, line 4, after the word "pay", to insert "out of the fund to which the money order otherwise would be chargeable,"; in line 9, after the word "rendered", to strike out "invald" and insert "invalid"; and after line 10, to strike out "Sec. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert "Sec. 2. The Treasurer of the United States is authorized and directed to pay out of the fund to which the check otherwise would be chargeable", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay out of the fund to which the money order otherwise would be chargeable, to Alex Morningstar, of 125 Summer Street, Boston, Mass., upon receipt of money order No. 39159, the sum of $100, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for the amount of such money order held by Mr. Morningstar and rendered invalid by the fact it contains more than one endorsement.

SEC. 2. The Treasurer of the United States is authorized and directed to pay out of the fund to which the check otherwise would be chargeable, to the said Alex Morningstar, upon receipt of United States Government check No. 7601, the sum of $41, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for the amount of such check held by Mr. Morningstar, payment having been refused on the ground that in accepting such check he failed to obtain the endorsement of the payee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF THE STEBBINS CONSTRUCTION CO.

The bill (S. 1769) to reimburse the Stebbins Construction Co. was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY. May we have some information as to the nature of the bill? What is the amount of the reimbursement?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the original bill provided that the case be referred to the Federal District Court for the Northern District of Oklahoma. The case arises out of the failure of the Irrigation and Reclamation Department to furnish this concern with steel and other materials for use in the construction of an irrigation project in southwestern Oklahoma. The company had the contract; the war came on, and the Government could not furnish the material. As a result of the failure of the Government, of course, no payment was made. The company made certain demands for payment, but could not secure payment, whereupon the bill was introduced to take the case into the Federal district court. The committee has recommended, instead, that it be sent to the Court of Claims. The matter will there be investigated, if the bill passes. If judgment is rendered by the Court of Claims, the matter will then go to the Treasury Department for payment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1769) to reimburse the Stebbins Construction Co., which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments, on page 1, line 4, after "United States", to strike out "District Court of the Northern District of Oklahoma" and insert "Court of Claims", and on page 2, line 4, after the word "Company", to insert a colon and "Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed as an inference of liability on the part of the Government of the United States", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render findings of fact as to the amount of loss, if any, sustained by Stebbins Construction Co., Tulsa, Okla., Reclamation Bureau contract No. 12–r–15914 arising out of and attributable to the alleged failure of the Government to supply materials as provided for in said contract.

The court shall cause such findings to be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the amount set forth in said findings to the Stebbins Construction Co.: Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed as an inference of liability on the part of the Government of the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. L. LEFFINGWELL

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1933) for the relief of C. L. Leffingwell, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That (a), notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law 600, Seventy-ninth Congress, approved August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 806), the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriation otherwise available for the reimbursement of expenses incurred in traveling and moving household effects by employees of the Railway Mail Service of the Post Office Department, to the persons named in subsection (b) hereof, such amounts for expenses as were incurred by them in connection with their transfer from one duty station to another on orders of officials of the Surface Postal Transport Division between the dates indicated following the names of each of such persons: Provided, That the amounts to be paid shall in each case be subject to administrative determination by the Post Office Department and audit by the General Accounting Office: Provided further, That no part of the respective amounts authorized to be paid by this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to, or received by any agent or attorney on account services rendered in connection with the claim of any person hereinafter named, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

(b) James H. Barrow, for expenses incurred between December 3, 1945, and July 23, 1947; Walter L. Robinson, Jr., for expenses incurred between April 20, 1947, and November 3, 1947; Allyn W. Reimund, for expenses incurred between July 24, 1947, and November 25, 1947; Walter E. Patterson, for expenses incurred between July 6, 1947, and November 9, 1947; Harold L. Marsh, for expenses incurred between February 3, 1947, and June 3, 1947; Malcolm R. Clark, for expenses incurred between August 14, 1947, and December 16, 1947; Marshall B. McRee, for expenses incurred between October 12, 1947, and February 13, 1948; Charles L. Leffingwell, for expenses incurred between July 28, 1947, and March 3, 1948; Eugene Attkisson, for expenses incurred between November 23, 1947, and October 1, 1948.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of C. L. Leffingwell and others."

DAVIS GROCERY CO.

The bill (S. 2339) for the relief of the Davis Grocery Co., of Oneida, Tenn., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Davis Grocery Co., of Oneida, Tenn., the sum of $5,184.26; in full satisfaction of its claim against the United States for subsidy as a class 2 meat slaughterer (permit No. P–63–076–1) during the period 1943 through 1946: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person, violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

BAGGETT TRANSPORTATION CO., INC.

The bill (S. 947) for the relief of the Baggett Transportation Co., Inc., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Baggett Transportation Co., Inc., Birmingham, Ala., the sum of $5,898.94. The payment of such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims of the said company against the United States on account of damage to and loss of use of truck No. 75, owned by said company, as a result of a collision between such truck and a United States Army truck on United States Highway No. 78, near Muscadine, Ala., on November 6, 1943. No part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

WALTER TEBO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2520) authorizing the issuance of a patent in fee to Walter Tebo, which had been reported from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell the trust allotment No. 110 of George Tebo, Jr., deceased, Winnebago allottee, described as the east half of the northeast quarter of section 9, township 26 north, range 8 east, sixth principal meridian, Thurston County, Nebr., containing 80 acres, conveyance to be made by deed or the issuance of a patent in fee to the purchaser and to disburse the proceeds of such sale to Walter Tebo for his benefit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the sale of certain allotted devised land on the Winnebago Reservation, Nebr."

INVESTIGATION OF BANKING AND CREDIT

The resolution (S. Res. 218) continuing the authority for investigation of banking and credit legislation, small business and economic stabilization, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHERRY. Over.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection?

Mr. WHERRY. I shall be glad to withhold my objection, if the Senator wants to make a statement.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, this resolution does not ask for any funds except those which were allotted by the Committee on Rules and Administration, which have not been expended, to carry on the work which we are now doing in connection with a certain investigation. We do not have the money to pay the employees after the 15th of February. It has been requested by the ranking Republican member of the committee. We did not send the resolution to the Committee on Rules and Administration, because we filed exactly what the Senator from Nebraska last year asked us to file, and we do not intend to do anything except what we told the committee we would do, and that is what we are now doing.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, may I have 5 minutes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from South Carolina has concluded.

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course, I did not use 5 minutes. I do not intend to make a speech on the subject, except to say that the resolution was approved long ago by the former Audit and Control Committee, and was approved by the Committee on Rules and Administration last year, authorizing certain persons to be paid for their work in certain investigations. We have never used one dime to cross the authority of another standing committee. We have merely proceeded with what the Committee on Rules and Administration last year advised us to proceed with. I was told that it was not necessary to go back to that committee, because we were asking for no money whatsoever. All we ask is to pay the persons who have been doing the work.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, in the report filed by the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. It is a unanimous request of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I am not objecting to the purpose of the investigation. I was one who joined unanimously in reporting the resolution when it was originally presented. I do not want the RECORD to show, nor do I want my remarks to be interpreted as showing, that I am opposing the purpose of the resolution at this time. I do say, however, that I feel that the resolution should have gone to the Committee on Rules and Administration, because it is my contention, and it is stated in the report, that there has been expended a total of $24,770.90. The report states that the committee, through the systematic practice of economy, such as making use of the regular committee staff, has succeeded in curbing expenses. Then the report goes on to say that the committee desires the right to spend the balance of the money to complete the investigation, which means, to my mind, that they are asking for the right to continue the committee and to reappropriate the money which is unexpended.

In order to keep the record clear, I should like to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, because it provides for money to be reappropriated out of the contingent fund. I should like to have the committee pass on it, and then have the resolution placed back on the calendar.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. In a moment. Inasmuch as it has to do primarily with small business, I would not mind continuing it temporarily. I want to comply with the request of the distinguished Senator, but I think other resolutions on the subject should be brought before the Senate for final determination prior to extending the committee for another year. If there is no intention of bringing up any such resolution I should be happy to go along with the resolution presented by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should like to ask the Senator if he desires to change the date from the 15th of February to the 15th of March. It is now the first day of February.

Mr. WHERRY. If the distinguished Senator will have the resolution referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, I shall agree to try to work it out with him so that the payments will be made.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, it is not up to me to refer it to a committee. I understood that it was not necessary to refer it to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHERRY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska is technically correct. The resolution involves a charge on the Senate over which the Committee on Rules and Administration would have jurisdiction. It would have been the part of wisdom to have the resolution follow the same course as would any other resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WHERRY. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

Mr. MAYBANK subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that Senate Resolution 218 be taken from the calendar and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. I may say I have had the opportunity of discussing the resolution with the distinguished chairman of that committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. I understand that the Committee on Rules and Administration is to meet next Wednesday.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. MAYBANK. At the regular meeting of the committee on next Wednesday we can discuss the matter with the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], Senate Resolution 218, continuing the authority for investigation of banking and credit legislation; small business and economic stabilization, Calendar No. 1246, is referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw my objection to the consideration of Calendar No. 1139, Senate bill 501.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Suppose we continue through the calendar, and return to the item which the Senator has in mind.

The clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 4567) to amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

EASEMENT FOR THE CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF A CERTAIN SEWER PIPE LINE

The bill (S. 2507) to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to grant to the East Bay Municipal Utility District, an agency of the State of California, an easement for the construction and operation of an interceptor sewer pipe line, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I do not think I have any objection to the consideration of the bill, but in order to have it in the RECORD for future reference, I wonder if my friend from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] will make a brief statement, so that I may be sure that my action does not conflict with my general policy of objecting to the giving away of Federal property.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I introduced this bill on August 29, 1949, at the request of the East Bay Municipal Utility District, and it was reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on January 26. It provides for two easements or two strips of land, 20 feet wide each, one extending a distance of 739.37 feet northerly from Tynan Avenue, and the other extending a distance of 926.84 feet southerly from Tynan Avenue, for the purpose of constructing a sewer. The bill has the approval of the Maritime Commission and it has been favorably reported by the committee. I understand it involves merely an easement and that the Maritime Commission property will be able to use the ground over the sewer easement.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and for future reference, I want to say that I shall not raise an objection to the consideration of the bill, for these reasons: First, the sewer which will be constructed will serve Federal interests as well as municipal and State interests, and therefore, the Federal Government will receive benefits from its construction. Second, the Government's interest in the use of the surface of the ground is in no way interfered with. Third, the reversionary rights of the Federal Government are protected by the bill. Therefore, because I do not think it in any way violates the general principle which I have consistently insisted upon, namely, that Federal property shall not be given away without reasonable compensation therefor, I shall not raise any objection to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2507) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Maritime Commission is authorized to grant and convey to the East Bay Municipal Utility District, an agency of the State of California, without cost to the said utility district, and subject to such terms and conditions as the United States Maritime Commission may deem proper, a perpetual easement for the construction, maintenance, operation, renewal, replacement, and repair of an interceptor sewer pipe line or pipe lines within (a) a strip of land twelve and one-half feet wide extending a distance of nineteen hundred and eighty-two and eighty-five one-hundredths feet along the southern boundary of lands comprising a part of the Maritime Alameda Shipyards, Alameda, Calif., and (b) two strips of land twenty feet wide each, one extending a distance of seven hundred and thirty-nine and thirty-seven one-hundredths feet northerly from Tynan Avenue and the other extending a distance of nine hundred and twenty-six and eighty-four one-hundredths feet southerly from Tynan Avenue, both lying along the easterly boundary of lands comprising a part of the Maritime Alameda Shipyard, Alameda, Calif., and contiguous to the westerly boundary line of the Central Pacific Railway Co. right-of-way, metes and bounds descriptions of such strips of land being on file with the United States Maritime Commission.

INVESTIGATION OF MATTERS RELATING TO CROP PRODUCTION

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 198) increasing the limit of expenditures by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in its investigation of matters relating to crop production, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration with an amendment, on page 2, line 10, to strike out "subcommittee" and insert "committee", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the subcommittee authorized by Senate Resolution 36, Eighty-first Congress, first session, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate, during the Eighty-first Congress, $38,000 in addition to the amount and for the same purposes as specified in said resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That section 3 of Senate Resolution 36, Eighty-first Congress, first session, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the duly authorized subcommittee is authorized during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Eighty-first Congress, to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable and with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of all agencies in the executive branch of the Government. The expenses of the subcommittee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

The resolution (S. Res. 208) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate, during the Eighty-first Congress, $10,000 in addition to the amount, and for the same purposes specified in section 134 (a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act approved August 2, 1946, as increased by Senate Resolution 175, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to October 13, 1949.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS INVESTIGATION

The resolution (S. Res. 217) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare through its subcommittee appointed pursuant to Senate Resolution 140 (Rept. No. 827) (Rept. No. 894), Eighty-first Congress, agreed to August 15, 1949, is hereby authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $108,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized for the same purposes.

INVESTIGATION OF OPERATIONS OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION AND ITS SUBSIDIARIES

The resolution (S. Res. 219) to investigate the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries was announced as next in order.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the Senator withhold his objection until I can make an explanation?

Mr. LUCAS. Certainly.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I regret very much that the majority leader wishes to withhold his approval of the resolution. For the information of the Senate let me say that the Committee on Banking and Currency approved the resolution, the subcommittee approved it, and the Committee on Rules and Administration approved it unanimously.

Last year the Commission studying the organization of the executive branch of the Government, commonly called the Hoover Commission, in its report No. 8 stated:

> We recommend (a) that the Congress review the power to make direct loans (excluding the two minor activities mentioned above), taking into account the problems of economy, efficiency, and integrity; (b) that in nonemergency periods the Congress place restrictions on direct loans in order to insure that the normal channels of credit are utilized to the maximum extent possible or alternatively provide for the guaranty of loans made by private or other established agencies.

A few days ago the majority leader introduced a bill regarding loans to small business by the RFC. One of the particular problems that concerns the committee is the tendency in recent months for the loans of the RFC to go to big business in the way of large loans.

For the information of the Senate I cite a few statistics. Of loans amounting to over $500,000 in 1934, in the depth of the depression, the RFC's share was $3,320,000. For the year 1949, the loans under $500,000 amounted to 166 million as compared to 181 million for loans over $500,000. As to smaller loans, as against $181,000,000, in 1949 the amount was $166,000,000. There is a decided tendency on the part of the RFC in recent months to increase the loans in the larger brackets.

As chairman of the subcommittee, with the responsibility of reviewing the activities of the RFC, I submit that it is necessary that we have some staff work done. Last year, without any staff work, I had some hearings on a few specific loans, such loans as that to Lustron, the Waltham Watch Co., and the Northwest Air Lines, involving the application of the policy established by Congress. It is my private, personal opinion that the RFC board during the last year has not interpreted the legislation as it was intended by the Congress. I know of no way to ascertain the facts other than by a provision such as that made by this resolution, that is, provision for a staff to go to the office of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and make an intelligent and adequate survey of the facts relating to these loans. I certainly have not the time to do it.

It seems to me that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is one of the most important agencies of the Government. It has the power to make a loan such as that with which we are familiar, the Kaiser-Frazer loan. I do not wish to go into the details of that, but it was a loan of $44,000,000. Such loans do not go through the congressional appropriating procedure. Here is a board consisting of five men, appointed by the Executive, which has the power to make direct loans to individuals or to individual corporations of as much as $44,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not object.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS OF CERTAIN TERMINATED WAR AGENCIES

The bill (H. R. 4387) to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Treasury Department, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4106) for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while in the course of their respective duties, suffered losses of personal property by reason of war conditions.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is a bill to reimburse 62 named individuals for personal property losses which they sustained as a result of war conditions while they were engaged in duties abroad as officers and employees of the State Department, or of agencies subsequently absorbed into the State Department. The total amount involved is $161,007.

The claims fall into two general groups: First, those resulting from bombings, lootings, or confiscation of property by enemy military or civil authorities; second, those resulting from damage or pilferage while in transit.

Each of these claims has been carefully reviewed by a special board set up by the Secretary of State, and responsibility for the correctness of the claims is assumed by this board, which consists of the Assistant Secretary of State for Administration, the legal adviser, and the Chief of the Division of Foreign Service Administration.

As originally presented to the Department, these claims totaled more than $247,000; and the Department has scaled them down to $161,000, by eliminating items believed to be excessive in value.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISHER CONTRACTING CO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1950) to reimburse the Fisher Contracting Co., which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 1, line 10, after the word "contracts", to insert a proviso as follows: "Provided, however, That no allowance shall be made for any loss sustained on account of the pouring of concrete during the period between June 1, 1946, and September 30, 1946, if the court shall find that Fisher Contracting Co. requested and was granted permission to perform such work during said period for the convenience of the company", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the District Court of the United States for the District of Arizona to hear, determine, and render findings of fact as to the amount of loss, if any, sustained by Fisher Contracting Co., of Phoenix, Ariz., under Reclamation Bureau contract No. 12r-15535 arising out of or attributable to the alleged failure of the Government to supply materials as provided for in said contracts: Provided, however, That no allowance shall be made for any loss sustained on account of the pouring of concrete during the period between June 1, 1946, and September 30, 1946, if the court shall find that Fisher Contracting Co. requested and was granted permission to perform such work during said period for the convenience of the company.

SEC. 2. The court shall cause such findings to be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the amount set forth in said findings to the Fisher Contracting Co.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I desire to object to the consideration of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator object?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is there objection to Senate bill 1950?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Yes.

CATHERINE A. GLESENER

The bill (S. 469) for the relief of Catherine A. Glesener, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I should like to have this measure go over until the next call of the calendar, for further study.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over. That completes the calendar.

PROVISION FOR RESEARCH AND STUDY BY PROFESSIONAL PERSONNEL OF THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to revert to Calendar No. 412, Senate bill 1393, so that I may make a brief explanation of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to read a letter in my 5 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Kansas. I now read from a letter I received on December 5:

There are pending before the Senate two bills, S. 1393 and H. R. 3946, either of which would authorize professional personnel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to attend accredited graduate schools for research and study. Both of these bills have been passed over on the Consent Calendar because of objections entered on behalf of the Republican Policy Committee. The passage of this legislation is important and urgent to the business of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and it would be of real help if you were to see fit to move to bring either bill before the Senate for action shortly after the beginning of the next session of Congress. * * *

The security of the United States depends in large measure upon our ability to keep, not only abreast, but ahead of other nations in technological advancements in aircraft.

The importance of air supremacy in any future war cannot be overemphasized—for convincing proof, we have but to look back briefly upon the events of World War II. With the advent of supersonic flight, the role of aviation in the Nation's security and safety takes on a new significance. We are entering upon an era where the whole concept of military strategy in warfare is being changed—where the way is open for any Nation to attain technical supremacy in supersonic airplanes if it is willing and able to make the necessary effort.

I will skip some of the letter in order to comply with the 5-minute rule.

During the past several years, a number of the NACA's most promising young scientists have left their positions in order to obtain advanced academic degrees. Many of these employees have not returned to the NACA upon completion of their studies because of more lucrative offers from other sources. Needless to say, the loss of such promising young men has a detrimental long-range effect upon the Nation's progress in aeronautical research.

* * * * *

The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics is charged by the Congress with the responsibility for conducting basic scientific research in aeronautics with the primary goal of improving military aircraft.

* * * * *

S. 1393 * * * (is) designed to remedy this situation. Under the provisions of either bill, the NACA could grant to selected professional employees a leave or leaves of absence (not to exceed 1 year in total) to pursue advanced research or study in fields closely related to the NACA's research program.

Mr. President, in light of this letter—as there is a limitation on the time I do not have time to read the entire letter—and because of the importance of the subject, and the request of NACA, and the fact that a similar bill passed the House, I am wondering if the Senator from Kansas might not feel inclined to withdraw his objection.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Maryland that I am not in a position to do that at this call of the calendar. Because the bill allows leaves of absence from the Government with pay, which is a departure from the existing general legislative authority granted departments, there was some question raised with the Senator from Kansas. I should be very happy to try to work out the matter before the next call of the calendar.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator. But let me say to him that the bill gives to the employees of the NACA only the same rights now enjoyed in all the other departments of the Government where research specialists are employed. It gives no rights that the other departments do not already have. The letter so states, although I do not have sufficient time to read it all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas still object?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Yes. I shall be glad to go over the matter with the Senator from Maryland and other Senators to see if we can work it out before the next call of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas objects.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make a comment or two with respect to the bill which has just been discussed by the Senator from Maryland. In view of the serious condition in which the United States finds itself in a very turbulent world, it seems to me that when a bill is reported unanimously from the Armed Services Committee, after its members have given the bill due and careful consideration, the Senator who desires to make objection to such a bill should make an objection only of a serious nature. Real reasons should be assigned for making objections to measures involving the national defense. I think Members of the United States Senate must be a little more serious and give a little more careful thought to bills of this nature. I merely mention that in passing.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to all concerned—and I am sure my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] will bear me out—that it is quite difficult at times for the members of the Armed Services Committee to give the complete picture of all these matters to the Senate because much of the testimony is off the record. But today I am going to do it, if the Senator from Illinois will yield to me for a moment or two.

Senators have heard about the hydrogen bomb. They have read that it is probably a pretty big bomb. We will have to have airplanes large enough to carry it. That requires research. In order to secure the necessary information the men engaged in such research have to go where experiments are being conducted in the schools and colleges and laboratories of America, for no planes can be built without the approval of this organization. We are losing time. We lost time on the wind tunnel legislation.

Mr. President, I dislike to have to make these statements on the floor, but what we are doing is selling America down the river when such bills are objected to time after time. The Senator from Maryland is not in a position to come on the floor and lay the information before the Senate because much of it is so classified that he cannot do so. Yet, I am compelled to do it today, in order to show that the passage of the bill is necessary for the national defense.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I wish to say most respectfully that as a member of the Committee on Armed Services I support what the Senator from Maryland has said. I respect the work the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] are doing on the calendar. I have the utmost regard for their conscientiousness of purpose, but I know that very careful consideration was given to this bill in the committee.

I agree with what the Senator from Maryland has said, that the bill represents an effort to give to the personnel who are engaged in research and building up new inventions in connection with airplanes the best possible opportunity to become educated at the places where they can go to receive instruction to enable them to carry out the necessary work. That is the important purpose of the bill.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I agree completely with what the Senator from Illinois has stated, that when a committee of the Senate, especially a committee such as that headed by the Senator from Maryland, makes a unanimous report on a bill, consideration should be given to it.

Irrespective of what kind of bomb is under consideration, whether it be the atom bomb, or the other one about which people are now frightening us, we are always going to have to discuss such things so long as we do not have international good will.

Another bill was objected to this afternoon, I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois. That bill was Senate bill 501 repealing section 202 (e) of the Sugar Act of 1948. It is Calendar No. 1139. That bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance, by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who heads that committee. Passage of that bill will have greater effect in doing away with the danger from bombs such as the Senator from Maryland has in mind than anything we can do. We are being asked to do something because we are being frightened by the bomb that may be developed. Passage of the bill to which I refer would do something to prevent such frightening things. We should do something to make it unnecessary to scare the people with stories of the bomb. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has withdrawn his objection to Senate bill 501. I hope that before the day is over we will consider that bill. The passage of that bill and other similar bills will promote good will, and will obviate the necessity for building tremendous airships and bombs. Passage of such legislation will bring about international good will. As I said, the bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance. Then we shall be getting down to brass tacks. Then we shall not be scared. We shall be acting like human beings, instead of trying to scare people. I hope that before the session is over, inasmuch as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has withdrawn his objection, the bill will be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] has the floor.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I know he has.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I shall be glad to accommodate the Senator from New Mexico at the proper time, and he can call up the bill to which he refers. Certainly if the repeal of section 202 of the Sugar Act would do anything to help get rid of the hydrogen bomb, I am for it immediately. We can take up that question as soon as we finish what we are doing at the present time. I certainly do not want to push any measure to the front without due consideration, but I do know that the Armed Services Committee probably has more important obligations and responsibilities at this particular time than has any other committtee.

Let me say to the Senator from Maryland, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] who is a member of that committee, that any time the Senator from Maryland believes any one of the bills from his committee is essential to the national defense and needs immediate consideration, I shall be glad to move to take it up, if we cannot pass it on the call of the calendar. That is the reason why, in a moment, I shall move to take up House bill 4080, which is a bill reported from the Armed Services Committee. I shall also move to take up another bill reported by that committee, because we have not been able to get them through on the call of the calendar.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I believe that Senators who check the financial aspects of bills render a great service to the country; but let me say, in the best of feeling, that I believe they ought to be a little more tolerant about national-defense bills than they are about the usual run of bills, particularly when the national-defense bills are unanimously reported from a committee consisting of six Republicans and seven Democrats.

Many of these bills are of vital importance. We have heard testimony on many phases of national defense, which the Senate itself has never heard, and which no other committee in the Senate has heard.

Time is important. Every invention and novelty in aviation comes through the board of scientists whom we have employed. There is a terriffic turn-over in that organization. I know that my friend from Kansas, who wants to protect the finances of the country, would not have objected had he had all the information. I ask that hereafter Members of the Senate not apply the dollar test too closely to matters which might affect the welfare and safety of the Nation. Delays in connection with many national-defense bills are very damaging to the whole defense picture.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Some reference has been made to delay which has been experienced by the committee. I wish to say to the distinguished Senator from Maryland that there is no disposition on the part of the senior Senator from Kansas to delay anything in connection with the national defense. However, I may say to the Senator from Maryland, with all due humility, that it is somewhat difficult to understand why many things in connection with some of these matters are considered to be such grave secrets when one can read about them in the daily newspapers and listen to descriptions of them over the air almost any day in the week.

I think we have an obligation to Members of the Senate. I should have much preferred to have this discussion take place when more Members of the Senate were in attendance this afternoon during the call of the calendar. I assure the Senator from Maryland that I have no disposition to delay any measure dealing with the national defense. But when Senators come to those of us who are trying to discharge a responsibility and say that they want to check into this or that, I think we are duty-bound to respect the views and wishes of such Senators.

I well understand that the majority leader, the Senator from Illinois, can obtain a call of the calendar for consideration of a particular measure almost at will. I want him to be able to do so in connection with these emergency measures. I see no reason for unnecessary delay.

Some questions have been raised with respect to some of the measures which have been objected to. I think the questions are meritorious. Perhaps in the eyes of the Senator from Maryland they are not so important as they are to some other Senators. I will cooperate in every way. I am sure that all Senators on this side of the aisle will cooperate. No Senator has any higher regard for the safety and welfare of the country than has the Senator from Kansas. I do not believe that a delay of 3 or 4 days or a week would entail the damage to which the Senator from Maryland refers. I sincerely hope not.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. This bill has been on the calendar for a long time, and it has been objected to several times in the past. Today it was objected to without the Senator from Maryland even having an opportunity to make an explanation of it. This is a bill of transcendental importance, and Senators objected to it without even giving the Senator from Maryland the courtesy of an opportunity to make an explanation. There is no pork in it. There is nothing in it that affects me. I have no more pride in it than has anyone else. But it does seem to me that when a bill affecting the national defense is called on the calendar it should not go over on the objection of one Senator, without some explanation.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that I have no desire to be discourteous. I listened to many objections on the part of other Senators. A Senator has the right and the privilege to ask for an explanation, and I think it would be somewhat rude on the part of the objecting Senator not to grant the request for an opportunity to make an explanation. I assure the Senator from Maryland that I would have been most happy to do so at that time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I said a moment ago, I admire Senators who wish to keep a check on the finances of the country. I think, though, that they might be a little more tolerant with some of these military bills than with the run-of-the-mine bills.

There are many bills with respect to which we cannot go into a complete or detailed explanation. In view of the importance and urgency of these bills, and the fact that we have so little time in which to take them up, and in view of the explanation which has been made, I ask the distinguished Senator from Kansas if he does not feel that in view of what I have said, we can pass this bill this afternoon.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Maryland that personally I would have no serious objection unless there were objections on the part of other Members of the Senate who noted their objections at the time the bill was called up and who are not now present. They might not now object if they were present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I assure the Senator that there would be no objection. We have very strong Republican representation on the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I wish there were more of them.

Mr. TYDINGS. There are fine men on the committee, men who cooperate to promote the defense of America. When a bill is unanimously reported from that committee, it has gone through the sieve and has been screened to the highest degree. I take my hat off to Senators who serve with me on that committee, because they have one single purpose, and that is the promotion of the defense of the United States. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection. This is an important bill.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the Senator from Maryland has said. On the other hand, I think that the point raised by the Senator from Kansas is perfectly sound. On the call of the calendar there are many times when several Senators will rise to make objection. I do not happen to think that they would have objected to this particular bill.

The bill was reported from our committee by unanimous vote. The majority leader has stated that he will be glad to move to take up the bill. That would be the orderly procedure. I am sure that with the explanation given by the Senator from Maryland it will pass the Senate in 15 minutes tomorrow when it is called up. I think there is some danger, on calls of the calendar, in going back over the ground.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. In answer to the query made by the Senator from Maryland, let me say that I shall be very glad to withdraw my objection with the distinct understanding that if it becomes necessary the Senator from Maryland will explain to distinguished Members of this body some of the matters about which they may have been fearful. That may not be necessary. In view of the explanations heretofore made, and the urgency expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, I am willing to withdraw my objection, and probably in a degree not fulfill exactly the letter of my responsibility.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator withdraws his objection. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1393) to promote the national defense and to contribute to more effective aeronautical research by authorizing professional personnel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to attend accredited graduate schools for research and study, reported from the Committee on Armed Services with an amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to keep the record straight in regard to the bill.

It has been said that this bill is of transcendental importance. In looking over the record of military bills, I find that this bill was reported in May of last year. Subsequently, two other measures, House bill 4080, Calendar No. 481, and Senate bill 2440, Calendar No. 926, have been reported, on June 10 and August 15, respectively.

Now the majority party has chosen in its wisdom to make the latter two bills the unfinished business, ahead of Senate bill 1393, Calendar No. 412, which the distinguished Senator from Maryland says is of such great importance. So I should like to have the RECORD show that Senate bill 1393 could have been made the unfinished business, ahead of House bill 4080 or Senate bill 2440.

I am entirely in favor of Senate bill 1393; and I have no objection whatsoever to it. But, Mr. President, I think the responsibility in these matters should be placed on the shoulders of those who supposedly are carrying the burden of the responsibility for conducting the business of the Senate. Before any question is raised in regard to objection by the minority, I think the distinguished Senator from Maryland should look to the majority leader and should ask him why the bill was not made the unfinished business, in view of its importance, instead of the two bills I have mentioned.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say that it never occurred to the Senator from Maryland that there would be the slightest objection to the bill, or at least no objection which a brief explanation would not remove.

There was considerable difference of opinion regarding the other two bills. Therefore, it was assumed that this bill would be passed after a short explanation was made, because there was no difference of opinion regarding it.

I have made explanations of the bill several times before, when objection was made to it on the call of the calendar. Objection was made last May. This is January. The bill should have been passed 6 months ago, in the interest of every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I should like to say that, judging from my short experience in this body, it is not safe for one to assume anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Armed Services with an amendment, at the end of the bill to insert:

SEC. 6. The total of the sums expended pursuant to this act, including all sums expended for the payment of salaries or compensation to employees on leave, shall not exceed $50,000 in any fiscal year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, there is a corresponding House bill on the calendar. The Senate bill, as now amended, places a limitation of $50,000 in any fiscal year on this work. The House bill contains no provision of limitation.

I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3946, the corresponding measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3946) to promote the national defense and to contribute to more effective aeronautical research by authorizing professional personnel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to attend accredited graduate schools for research and study.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I now move that all after the enacting clause of the House bill be stricken, and that there be inserted, in lieu thereof, the text of the Senate bill, as amended, including the limitation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 3946) was read the third time and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 1393 will be indefinitely postponed.

REPEAL OF SECTION 202 (E) OF THE SUGAR ACT OF 1948

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, when Senate bill 501, Calendar No. 1139, was reached during the call of the calendar, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] objected. Since that time he has withdrawn his objection. I now ask unanimous consent that we revert to that bill on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I most respectfully object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, again referring to the fine remarks of the majority leader of the Senate, I would respectfully call to the attention of this body the report of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] on this bill. It reads in part as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 501) repealing section 202 (e) of the Sugar Act of 1948, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment, and recommend that the bill do pass.

GENERAL EXPLANATION

Section 202 (e) gives authorization to the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce the amount of sugar which might be allocated to an importing nation under the Sugar Act if the Secretary of State should find that that nation denies fair and equitable treatment to the nationals of the United States, its commerce, navigation, or industry.

This section has been widely interpreted in other countries as a threat of economic sanctions by the United States should it be dissatisfied with any action by a sugar-exporting country with respect to United States interests of any kind. This section was originally approved by the Congress upon the recommendation of the Department of State. It has been interpreted as being inconsistent with the conviction and policy of the United States that relations with other countries should be conducted on a basis of friendly negotiation and mutual agreement. Repeal of this section would be a reaffirmation by the Congress of this fundamental United States policy.

Upon the recommendation of the Departments of State, Commerce, and Agriculture your committee agrees that this section should not be included in the Sugar Act of 1948 but does not abandon its conviction that the Government of the United States should seek by friendly negotiation and mutual agreement with other countries to secure fair and equitable treatment to the nationals of the United States, its commerce, navigation, or industry.

The views of the Departments of State, Commerce, Interior, and Agriculture are expressed in the following communications received by your committee.

An excerpt from one of the communications is as follows:

Since the repeal of the subject section would appear to be primarily in the interest of international good will and since the existence of section 202 (e) is of very doubtful importance to American commerce, this Department has no objection to its repeal by the enactment of S. 501.

CHARLES SAWYER,
Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. Brannan, Secretary of Agriculture, says the following, in his letter:

Since the Department has responsibility under the quota system to make available adequate supplies of sugar for consumption in continental United States, section 202 (e) is of concern to the Department only insofar as it affects that responsibility.

The State Department sent a letter to the Senator from Georgia, the letter being signed for the Secretary of State by Charles E. Bohlen, counselor. That letter reads in part as follows:

In view of the fact that the intent of this section of the act has been widely misunderstood and that circumstances under which the use of this section might be considered desirable now appear remote, the Department perceives no objection to its repeal.

So, Mr. President, the Department of State, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior, as reported by the chairman of the Finance Committee, who has reported the bill, favor its enactment.

If enactment of the bill is considered desirable by all those agencies of our Government, I certainly hope there will not be objection by any Senator to the present consideration and passage of the bill. In all sincerity, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts not to lend aid to any interests which would attempt to "sell out" the good will of the United States, or take action at the expense of a little country like Cuba.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Some responsible citizens of Massachusetts have written me personally, objecting to the bill. I do not know its merits or demerits; but as I understand the purpose of the call of the calendar, it is to allow further consideration of matters of this kind.

I am not venomous in my position in this matter. If the Senator from New Mexico wishes to consider my position in that spirit, he may do so, of course; but in objecting to the bill at this time, I am simply doing my duty to my constituents in Massachusetts.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I do not at any time question the sincerity or purpose or motives of the Senator from Massachusetts. I am merely stating that it is about time that we give something other than lip service to the good-neighbor, good-will policy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard to the request of the Senator from New Mexico.

NOTICE OF ADDRESS BY SENATOR McMAHON ON THE PRESIDENTIAL DECISION TO BUILD THE HYDROGEN BOMB

Mr. McMAHON. I understand it is not considered good practice to request unanimous consent to be recognized on a succeeding day. Therefore, I shall not do so. But I should like to advise the Senate that I shall seek recognition as soon as possible tomorrow, for the purpose of addressing Members of the Senate upon the Presidential decision to build a hydrogen bomb, and to speak about certain of the implications which I see resulting therefrom.

CODIFICATION OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4080, which is Calendar Order No. 481.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 4080) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4080) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Article for the Government of the Navy and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice, which had been reported from the Committee on Armed Services with an amendment.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, my amendments lettered B to Z to House bill 4080, which is the unfinished business, together with explanations of the amendments.

There being no objection, the amendments and the explanations thereof were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT B

On page 106, beginning with line 21, strike out all down to and including line 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(12) 'Judge advocate' shall be construed to refer to all officers of the Regular Army or Air Force appointed in the appropriate Judge Advocate General's Corps, and all nonregular officers of any component of the Army or Air Force of the United States on active Federal duty assigned to the appropriate Judge Advocate General's Corps by competent orders."

On page 119, beginning with line 18, strike all down to and including line 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) General courts-martial, which shall consist of any number of members not less than five;".

On page 127, beginning with line 22, strike out all down to and including line 6 on page 128 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"ART. 26. Law member of a general court-martial.

"The authority convening a general court-martial shall appoint as a member thereof a law member who shall be a judge advocate or a law specialist or an officer who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States and who is certified to be qualified for such duty by The Judge Advocate General of the armed force of which he is a member. No person shall be eligible to act as a law member in a case in which he is an accuser or a witness for the prosecution or has acted as investigating officer or as counsel in the same case."

On page 138, beginning with line 12, strike out all down to and including line 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"ART. 39. Sessions.

"Whenever a general or special court-martial is to deliberate or vote, only the members of the court shall be present. All other proceedings, including any consultation of the court with counsel, shall be made a part of the record and be in the presence of the accused, the defense counsel, and the trial counsel."

On page 147, beginning with line 17, strike out all down to and including line 3 on page 148 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) The law member of a general court-martial and the president of a special court-martial shall rule upon interlocutory questions, other than challenge, arising during the proceedings. All rulings shall be made in open court and recorded. Any such ruling made by the law member of a general court-martial upon any interlocutory question other than a motion for a finding of not guilty, or the question of accused's sanity, shall be final and shall constitute the ruling of the court; but the law member may in any case consult with the court, in closed session, before making a ruling, and may change any such ruling at any time during the trial. Unless such ruling be final, if any member objects thereto, the court shall be cleared and closed and the question decided by a vote as provided in article 52, viva voce, beginning with the junior in rank."

On page 12, line 11, strike out "officer" and insert in lieu thereof "member."

On page 128, line 17, strike out "law officer" and insert in lieu thereof "law member."

On page 139, lines 5, 13, and 16, respectively, strike out the word "officer" and insert in lieu thereof respectively the word "member."

On page 148, line 5, strike out "officer" and insert in lieu thereof "member."

EXPLANATION

H. R. 4080 as reported abolishes the law member who has been a most useful member of Army courts martial since 1920 and substitutes for him a figurehead "law officer." The proponents have convinced the Armed Services Committee that the change is a desirable one on the theory that the law officer is analogous to a judge. In its report the committee stated (S. Rept. 486):

"Article 26 provides the authority for a law officer of a general court martial. Under existing law the Navy has no law officer. The Army and the Air Force do have a law officer for general courts martial who, in addition to ruling upon points of evidence, retires, deliberates, and votes with the court on the findings and sentence. Officers of equal experience on this subject are sharply divided in their opinion as to whether the law officer should retire with the court and vote as a member. In view of the fact that the law officer is empowered to make final rulings on all interlocutory questions of law, except on a motion to dismiss and a motion relating to the accused's sanity, and under this bill will instruct the court upon the presumption of innocence, burden of proof, and elements of the offense, it is not considered desirable that the law officer should have the voting privileges of a member of the court. This is consistent with the practice in civil courts where the judge does not retire and deliberate with the jury."

It is significant that those witnesses who are really familiar with the administration of military justice under the present army system have uniformly scoffed at the analogy. I quote from the statement of the Judge Advocate General of the Army:

"2. Limitation on the powers of the law member.

"Article 26 creates the position of a 'law officer.' This officer, unlike the law member appointed pursuant to article of war 8, is not a member of the court. He may rule on interlocutory questions, instruct the court as to the presumption of innocence, and assist the court in preparing the formal findings after the actual findings have been made, but he is deprived of his vote and excluded from the closed sessions of the court. This results in the loss of legal experience and learning during the most critical stage of the proceedings and deprives the court of legal guidance at a time when it most urgently requires such guidance. The requirement of the Kem amendment that a law member be a lawyer and that he participate in all proceedings of a court martial is regarded by all who have had experience in the administration of military justice as the most significant improvement since automatic appellate review. The limitation on the effectiveness of the law member will result in miscarriages of justice both to the detriment of accused persons as well as to the detriment of the interests of the Government."

The only argument for the change which I have been able to discover advanced by the proponents of the bill is that it is desirable to have the law member's instructions appear upon the record. I have no objection to that. The present Manual for Courts-Martial requires that the law member's instructions be given in open court.

Professor Morgan, for whom I have a great deal of esteem, justified this provision to the House Armed Services Committee as follows:

"The charge which he gives them will be on the record—everything that he gives in open court will be on the record. When they go back to deliberate they are like a jury and there is no particular record with reference to that.

"The law member, when he retires with the court, may make any kind of statement to them. And it has been stated—I would not say on how good authority—that frequently when he went back there why he said, 'Of course the law is this way but you fellows don't have to follow it'" (hearing on H. R. 2498, p. 607).

I doubt if any lawyer law member ever said a thing like that. The presence of the law member in the closed sessions is infinitely more likely to prove a deterrent against the expression of such a sentiment by anyone.

The analogy between the proposed law officer and a civilian judge is more apparent than real. For example, he rules subject to objection to any member of the court on the question of a motion for a finding of not guilty under article 51. Suppose that he has ruled, as a matter of law, that the prosecution has not proved a prima facie case and a member objects to his ruling. Under the proposed code the court closes—excludes the law officer, and votes on this legal question. The law officer cannot explain his ruling, defend it, or vote to sustain it. Although under Article of War 31 such a ruling by the present law member is also subject to objection at least he can defend his ruling against the argument of a member who may not be well versed in the law. I don't believe this change which makes the law member a mere figurehead is defensible.

Col. Frederick Bernams Wiener, who is a prolific writer on military law, told the House committee:

"Colonel WIENER. Yes. In that connection, I think that the provision to remove the law officer from the deliberations would be very, very detrimental. Now, when you remove him for deliberations, and I have in mind that he is disinterested, and that he is a lawyer and that is a reform for which we are indebted to the Elston bill—by taking him out you take out of the deliberations the one man who can make the most helpful contribution to the deliberations. That, I know, is obvious to any lawyer or any other officer who has sat on any court martial and had the assistance of a trained-law member.

"I cannot help but think that the provision removing the law member from the deliberations was not the product of anyone who ever sat on a court, when you consider, gentlemen, that all the grief and all the difficulties and all the confusion, and all the mix-ups to which Mr. ELSTON and his committee listened 2 years ago resulted from ignorance rather than wickedness. It was mostly ignorance.

"That gap was plugged by insuring that the law member had to be a lawyer. Now you remove him just when he is able to do the most good. It is the analogy, gentlemen, of the jury trial, but the law officer does not have the judge's power. It is wholly a false analogy. It is a jury trial without the safeguards. It is an importation from the English practice and it is always dangerous, gentlemen, to transplant instructions. In England the members of the court are officers, military officers. The judge advocate is a barrister, a civilian, not a military man. The judge advocate sits there in his barrister's gown and wig. He instructs the court. Here we have never had that sort of thing. He is a civilian. He does not sit down with officers.

"Here you are proposing to make that law officer a member of the military forces. He is not a civilian. Why shouldn't he sit down with the court and give them the additional assistance which his legal knowledge enables him to give? I think this notion of taking the law member out of the court just at the time when they are about to perform their most important function is the most retrograding step in this bill."

Lt. Col. Thomas H. King, national judge advocate of the Reserve Officers' Association told the House Committee:

"Now the question of the law member sitting with the court. To me it is inconceivable that the law member not sit with the court. We talk about endeavoring to take from command authority the right to control a court. But what do we do? We take the one man who is certified by the Judge Advocate General as qualified to sit on a court and take him out of it.

"He is the one man who is not subject to command influence if there is any, because he has been especially certified to sit as the law member of that court or the law officer or whatever his title may be.

"To us who have tried a few of these cases—and I had the experience in February of trying one under the Elston bill—it was one of the greatest pleasures I had, to have a law officer sitting up on that court who knew what he was doing. While we did not agree as to every point, we had a very capable man. And while the result of the case was not to my total satisfaction, I left that courtroom with a definite feeling that a fair break had been given to the accused."

To me it is quite obvious that the law officer set up by article 26 is far from being a judge. A judge can direct a verdict of not guilty without having a member of the jury object and override him. He can sentence the accused; he can set aside a verdict as being against the weight of the evidence and he can grant a new trial. Without those powers he is no more than a referee or an umpire. I can think of no better safeguard to insure that a case be judged by the evidence and not by passion or suspicion than to have the law member present in the closed sessions of the court. I suspect that Professor Morgan and the Armed Services Committee have been sold a bill of goods by the services which does not now have a law member. I suspect that the Navy is willing to provide for the appearance of due process by accepting a figurehead law officer, but it does not want a legal conscience present in the closed sessions of the court to deter the expression of sentiments such as Professor Morgan attributes to an anonymous law member. I agree with General Green that it is highly doubtful that a lawyer law member ever said a theory like that. Although I have not seen the Senate Armed Services Committee hearings, I understand that General Harmon, the Judge Advocate General of the Air Force agreed with General Green. The view of the two services which have had experience with law members has greater weight with me than the patently fictitious theory that a figurehead law officer performs the functions of a judge. My amendment B is calculated to restore the law member to the position which he now holds under the Kem amendment to the Selective Service Act.

AMENDMENT C

On page 107, beginning with line 19, strike out all down to and including line 22.

On page 107, strike out line 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The following persons are subject to these articles and shall be understood as included in the term 'any person subject to this code.'"

On pages 107 and 108, renumber all succeeding paragraphs in article 2.

On page 109, beginning with line 9, strike out all down to and including line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Subject to the provisions of article 43, jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the several district courts of the United States to try and punish according to the applicable provisions and limitations of this code and the regulations made thereunder—

"(1) any person charged with having committed an offense against this code while in a status in which he was subject to this code which status has been terminated;

"(2) any person of the Reserve component of the armed forces for an offense against this code committed while such person is on inactive duty training authorized by written orders which are voluntarily accepted by such person;

"(3) retired personnel of a Regular component of the armed forces who are charged with having committed an offense against this code and who are entitled to receive pay."

On page 108, beginning with line 22, strike out all down to and including line 7 on page 109 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(12) In time of war or national emergency, subject to the provisions of any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party, all persons within an area leased by or otherwise reserved or acquired for the use of the United States which is under the control of the Secretary of a Department and which is without the continental limits of the United States and the following Territories: That part of Alaska east of longitude 172 degrees west, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, except insofar as these articles define offenses of such nature that they can be committed only by military personnel."

EXPLANATION

Article 2 (3) of H. R. 4980 extends military jurisdiction to "Reserve personnel while they are on inactive duty training authorized by written orders which are voluntarily accepted by them, which orders specify that they are subject to this code."

Article 3 (a) continues military jurisdiction with respect to persons who have been separated from the service.

This seems to me unwarranted. The civilian components bitterly oppose these extensions of military jurisdiction. My amendment is substantially that proposed by General Green, The Judge Advocate General of the Army. His statement to the Armed Services Committee is an honest expression of a reasonable military man who is opposed to the extension of military power over the civilian population.

1. Extension of military jurisdiction over civilians.

"It has long been recognized that nonmilitary persons who travel and serve with an army in the field must be subject to the discipline of the army, else their conduct can seriously affect the security and discipline of that force. Consequently, such persons have been subject to military laws since the Articles enacted by the Continental Congress. When, however, there is no exigent need for the exercise of military jurisdiction over civilians, Congress has been very zealous to preserve civilian jurisdiction.

"Insofar as Army and Air Force personnel are concerned, articles 2 (3) and 3 (a) of the code extend military jurisdiction over persons not now subject to it. I believe this is unnecessary and the inevitable result will be public revulsion against its exercise. It has been my experience that, no matter how just and fair the system of military justice may be, if it reaches out to the civilian community, every conceivable emotional attack is concentrated on the system. This is as it should be. The framers of the Constitution recognized that civilians should be tried by civilian courts and they established a military system of courts for the Army and Navy. I recognize that reservists on inactive duty training may commit offenses, perhaps serious ones. I also recognize that many serious offenses committed by persons subject to military law are not detected until the person is separated from the service. I do not advocate that such persons should go unpunished. I merely suggest that you confer jurisdiction upon Federal courts to try any person for an offense denounced by the code if he is no longer subject thereto. This would be consistent with the fifth amendment of the Constitution.

"Article 3 (a) is particularly unworkable. It provides that, subject to the statute of limitations, any person charged with having committed an offense against the code, punishable by confinement of 5 years or more and for which he cannot be tried in a Federal or State court while in a status in which he was subject to the code, shall not be relieved from amenability to trial by courts martial. The question as to whether he can be tried by a Federal or State court for the offense becomes a jurisdistional one. It may be hard to decide. In United States v. Bowman (260 U. S. 94) the Supreme Court held that any offense directly injurious to the Government for which Congress provided no territorial limitation may be tried by a district court no matter where the offense is committed. Whether a particular offense comes within this limited category is a fit subject for debate among lawyers. It may not be settled except by the Supreme Court. It is not a proper subject for determination by a court martial. If you expressly confer jurisdiction on the Federal courts to try such cases, you preserve the constitutional separation of military and civil courts, you save the military from a lot of unmerited grief and you provide for a clean, constitutional method for disposing of such cases."

I quote from the statements of representatives of the Reserve components before the House committee.

Mr. John J. Finn, representing the American Legion:

IV. JURISDICTION

"The American Legion calls attention to the expanded jurisdiction conferred upon military courts in the proposed code. It may be that such is necessary. If atomic warfare comes, there is the distinct probability that within a few hours after commencement of hostilities, all activities in America would be subject to martial or military law. All people would then become subject to the proposed or a similar code. At least military commissions would take the place of civil courts.

"There has been of late a seemingly increasing inclination to widen the jurisdiction of military authority. In the past, Congress has zealously guarded the distinction between the civilian and the military indicated as essential by the writers of the Constitution.

"The military has not always been content to remain within constitutional or statutory limits in this regard. Witness the cases of Duncan v. Kahanamoku (327 U. S. 304); United States ex rel Hirshberg v. Cooke (17 U. S. Law WK. 4223); Rosborough v. Rossell (150 F. 2d 809).

"The American Legion is certain that the majority of those in the military and naval service intend to carry out their assigned tasks with the American spirit in mind and within limits imposed by statute and the Constitution. However, wherever an authority is granted, there will always be some who will take advantage thereof and abuse it; some through ignorance, and a smaller number through arbitrary willfulness.

"With this in mind, it is the position of the Legion that the proposals in H. R. 2498 in regard to jurisdiction should undergo the close scrutiny of all concerned before passage.

"It may be that with its better facilities for obtaining information, because of world conditions, and possible defects in the present codes, the Congress will believe it proper to enlarge the jurisdiction as proposed or confer it to a greater extent.

"In order to provide for temporary situations, and to correct the present codes, however, we should not surrender so much of our liberties that our form of government may or will be endangered.

"If Congress, in its wisdom, decides it is necessary to widen jurisdiction, it is believed that professionally trained lawyers should administer the code. There is an almost vital necessity to provide an adequate and foolproof system of review. If jurisdiction is to be enlarged, it behooves us to enlarge the powers of the boards that are to review the actions of military courts and not so to circumscribe the activities of such boards that they are or can be rendered impotent in time of emergency or hysteria."

Col. Melvin Maas, national president of the Marine Corps Reserve Association:

"Colonel MAAS. That these articles apply to Reserve personnel who are voluntarily on inactive duty training authorized by written orders.

"Now, gentlemen, to personalize this again, at the request of the Marine Corps I organized a Reserve wing staff 6 months ago. I am in command of that wing staff. We are a volunteer organization.

"We receive no pay. We do not wear uniforms. The Government furnishes no quarters. We meet once a month, in civilian clothes, for 2 hours, and we study military matters. Under this proposal, if I should happen to make a remark that was considered derogatory of the President or of the Cabinet or of the Congress, anytime within 3 years I can be ordered back to active duty for some alleged remark I made in my civilian capacity and held indefinitely without my own consent for court martial.

"Now, gentlemen, if you want to destroy the Reserves we are building up, that will be a fine section to leave in the bill.

"Now, we are in complete agreement that Reserves when they are on actual active duty should be subject to the same code as all Regulars. But, gentlemen, it is going far afield to apply it to the ROTC and to apply it to Volunteer Reserves. This could actually apply to a man in his own home studying a correspondence course, gentlemen.

"If some neighbor stopped in and he made some remark that might be interpreted as being critical of the President, he might be called to account 2 or 3 years later, when he did not even remember of such a remark being made. Gentlemen, that is a very dangerous provision.

"It is unnecessary and unworkable and in my opinion will cast reflection upon your whole bill and it will have a tendency to destroy your Reserve—your Volunteer Reserve. It is just inconsistent with our whole fundamental concept, gentlemen.

"Mr. RIVERS. Is this the first time such a thing has been proposed?

"Colonel MAAS. Why of course it is the first time that such a thing has ever been considered.

"Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Larkin seems to dissent from that statement.

"Mr. BROOKS. We will hear from Mr. Larkin later. By the way, I have heard Mr. Larkin discuss this and I think the committee, too, is entitled to his views. He is a witness later on, is he not?

"Mr. SMART. On a section-by-section reading of the bill for amendments, Mr. Larkin will explain the position of the National Military Establishment on all sections.

"Mr. RIVERS. What is the situation with regard to that prohibition now, as the law exists today?

"Colonel MAAS. Well, to the best of my knowledge—and I have had very extensive experience for 32 years in the service and the Reserve—there is no restriction about my making any comments.

"Of course I do not expect to commit any acts that would be detrimental to the Military Establishment. But if, when I am sitting down in private quarters merely studying military subjects, every remark is to be subject to court martial, why it does not become very attractive to give my time to training myself further.

"I do not think my views are any different than a million other young—younger men.

"You know, gentlemen, this almost smacks of attempting to impose thought control in this country. Now I do not have any question about it. I say when a Reserve is on active duty and performing military duty he ought to be subject to all laws.

"But think very carefully before you extend it to ROTC and extend it to volunteer training units.

"Gentlemen, on page 6, article 3, subsection (a)—you must have some limitation on the time in which personnel can be ordered to active duty for a trial by court martial. If you are going to retain the provision that the Reserves are subject to it, you have to put some other limitation than 3 years.

"It is unfair to call a Reserve in as late as 3 years later and say '3 years ago you made a remark about the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of Defense or the President or some Congressman.'

Lieutenant Colonel King, national judge advocate, Reserve Officers' Association:

"The next point—and with that I am going to finish—is the question of making Reserve officers in inactive status, that is on inactive duty training, subject to the Articles of War. To me it is a gag if it were applied not as intended, not as these people say they think it should be put into effect, but within the letter of the law.

"Suppose I come in to my commanding officer—Colonel Wiener—for a drill 10 minutes late and I have said something down here that he did not like or the Department did not like. Well, they can court martial me, put me on an active duty, and hold me because I was 10 minutes late as the excuse. It is a dangerous thing.

"I personally have no objection to being tried by a court martial, because I am convinced that you get just as fair a break there as you do with any civilian court in the country. And with the requirements for an investigation under article of war 70, or whatever it is in the Elston bill, you have to have an experienced investigator and they do not kid with you. They get the facts.

"They get them by means that we do not approve, that the defense lawyer will get up before the court and scream his head off about, but they really get the facts and if you are guilty, I think they get you.

"And I think also if you are not guilty they are less likely to convict you.

"As to this business of influence of courts, my personal experience in Europe was a very unique one. I sat as a claims commission and not as one having to do with military justice. I tried several thousand cases. And I had an office next door to the president of our general court.

"We are very good friends. And I tell you that even if the staff judge advocate did try to influence him, he had the courage of his convictions, and I think most of them did because they were good officers.

"They had the courage of their convictions to do what they thought was right. Some of them may not have, but we also have civilians who do not have the courage of their convictions.

"So, gentlemen, with those four things, we really feel that the military being experienced in the military and the Navy officers being experienced in Navy activities, should be the ones to make the decision, with a definite limitation as to the manner in which these people are appointed. I like the Elston bill.

"I fought for it. I think this committee did a magnificent job in preparing it. I think they came out with something good."

These are samples of the views of the Reserve components. I think they are reasonable. I see no reason for extending military jurisdiction over civilians. I concede that Reserve personnel on inactive duty may be guilty of serious offenses and that serious offenses are frequently not brought to light until the culprit has been separated from the service. No one, except the offender perhaps, would argue that such offenders should go untried and unpunished, but there can be no objection to according civilians a right to a trial by jury and trial by a civilian court. The chairman of the subcommittee of the House of Representatives, when confronted with a similar proposal, questioned whether the Federal courts would have jurisdiction over offenses committed outside their district. I submit that title 18 of the United States Code is full of penal statutes denouncing acts committed on the high seas and elsewhere in the special territories and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. We are all familiar with the treason trials where offenses were committed in Germany or Japan and tried in United States district courts. The Supreme Court in U. S. v. Bowman (260 U. S. 94), held that a Federal court had jurisdiction to try a conspiracy to defraud the United States where the conspiracy was committed on foreign soil. Title 18, United States Code, section 3238, provides for venue in such cases; 18 United States Code, 3238, provides as follows:

"The trial of all offenses begun or committed upon the high seas, or elsewhere out of the jurisdiction of any particular State or district, shall be in the district where the offender is found, or into which he is first brought."

There is nothing unconstitutional about my amendments; on the other hand, there is grave doubt as to the constitutionality of the provisions of article 3 (a) under the fifth amendment. Are these cases arising in the land and naval forces, or are they causes? A case, as I understand it, arises when a prosecution is instituted, a cause, when an offense is committed. Have courts martial the power to try a person who is a civilian when the case arises. I suggest we avoid the grave constitutional doubt by adopting this amendment.

With respect to retired personnel a different problem arises. Although they are merged with the civil population they are still a part of the armed forces. They are now subject to military law although it is contrary to the policy of the Army to try them, except for the most serious offenses. My amendment would leave their status as it now is, except that it would give the Federal courts concurrent jurisdiction to try them for offenses against the code.

Article 12 (a) as originally proposed by the Morgan group attempted to confer military jurisdiction over all persons in leased bases, such as the British base in the West Indies, in time of peace as well as war, for all sorts of offenses, military offenses as well as offenses of a civil nature. I made my views known to the House committee and told them that the provision is contrary to executive agreements entered into with the British and Philippine Governments and that, moreover, it was contrary to international law. In an attempt to meet the criticism, the House committee amended the section by providing that it be "subject to the provision of any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law." Other than the fact that this is putting the cart before the horse, I wonder whether every officer exercising special court-martial jurisdiction is going to know about all treaties, executive agreements, and rules of international law.

The proponents of the bill have consistently stated that it was patterned after 34 United States Code 1201. This statute was extremely well drafted by thoughtful draftsmen. In part, it provides:

"In addition to the persons now subject to the articles for the government of the Navy, all persons, other than those persons in the military service of the United States * * * which is within an area leased by the United States which is without the territorial jurisdiction thereof and which is under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, shall, in time of war or national emergency, be subject to the articles for the government of the Navy, except insofar as these articles define offenses of such nature that they can be committed only by naval personnel."

This statute is consistent with and declaratory of international law in that it limits this extraordinary jurisdiction to—

1. Offenses other than purely military ones, and is operative.

2. Only in time of war or national emergency.

To my way of thinking, the salient applicable rules of international law should be stated right in the statute so that no one need be confused or have any doubts thereon. Otherwise we will run into international complications every time some irritated junior officer attempts to exercise military jurisdiction in peacetime over a resident of a foreign island who has no connection with our forces other than that he might reside in a leased area, for some such offense as disrespect to a commissioned officer. The limitation pertinent to treaties and agreements is not objectionable and might do some good.

AMENDMENT D

On page 116, beginning with line 5, strike out all down to and including line 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following.

"ART. 14. Delivery of offenders to civil authorities.

"(a) When any person subject to this code, except one who is held by the military authorities to answer, or who is awaiting trial or result of trial, or who is undergoing sentence for a crime or offense punishable under this code, is accused of a crime or offense committed within the geographical limits of the States of the Union and the District of Columbia, and punishable by the laws of the land, the commanding officer is required, except in time of war, upon application duly made, to use his utmost endeavor to deliver over such accused person to the civil authorities, or to aid the officers of justice in apprehending and securing him, in order that he may be brought to trial.

"(b) When, under the provisions of this code, delivery is made to the civil authorities of an offender undergoing sentence of a court martial, such delivery, if followed by conviction, shall be held to interrupt the execution of the sentence of the court martial, and the offender shall be returned to military custody, after having answered to the civil authorities for his offense, for the completion of such court-martial sentence."

On page 121, lines 1 and 2, strike out "and may adjudge any punishment permitted by the law of war."

On page 130, beginning with line 12, strike out all down to and including line 16.

On page 130, line 17, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(a)".

On page 130, line 25, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(b)".

On page 179, beginning with line 16, strike out all down to and including line 24 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"ART. 98. Noncompliance with procedural rules or provisions for turning over offenders to civil authorities.

"Any person subject to this code who willfully fails to enforce or comply with any of the requirements of articles 14, 30 through 34, or 37 shall be punished as a court martial may direct."

EXPLANATION

Article 14: The present seventy-fourth article of war makes it mandatory in time of peace for military authorities to hand over to the civilian authorities a man charged with an offense by civilian authorities, unless the accused is being held by the Army for a military offense. In the Navy though surrender of such a person is discretionary here again the Navy's view won out. There isn't any good reason why the civil authorities in the United States should not exercise their jurisdiction over all citizens whether they be civilians or soldiers. This statute making discretionary whether a criminal should or should not be turned over to civil authorities grants a license for misprision of a felony at the whim of any local commander. I can see no reason for the invasion of the sovereignty of States and I recommend that we stay within the law as it is now administered by the Army. Let us avoid conflict between the State authorities and military authorities and not leave matters such as these to vague discretion.

In order to preserve the punitive provisions of article of war 74, I am expressly making it a part of article 98 of this code—now compliance with procedural rules. That article as proposed by the National Military Establishment and passed by the House is a remarkable piece of legislation. It provides among other things:

Any person subject to the code who * * * knowingly and intentionally fails to enforce or comply with any provisions of the code regulating the proceedings before, during, or after trial of an accused; shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

I ask the many lawyers in this body how they would like to practice law or sit as judges in a jurisdiction with a penal statute like this. To be sure, to be criminal a procedural error must be intentional. But everyone is presumed to know the law; ignorance of the law is no excuse and intent is something which the court may infer from the circumstances. Intent is sometimes easier to prove than to disprove. The implications of the article are startling. The proponents say innocently in their commentary:

"Paragraph (2) is new, and is intended to enforce procedural provisions of this code, for example, article 37 (unlawfully influencing action of court) and article 31 (compulsory self-incrimination)."

And it is on this line that the proposed article is urged throughout the hearings and reports. It is supposed to put teeth in article 37, a very good section indeed taken directly from article of war 88 of the Kem amendment to the Selective Service Act of 1948. That article is supposed to forbid an appointing authority from censuring, reprimanding, or admonishing a court or any member or counsel thereof with respect to the findings or sentence adjudged by the court or with respect to any other exercise of its or his functions in the conduct of the proceedings.

Now article 98 is supposed to put teeth into this statute—and so it does provide a means to punish the appointing authority who censures or reprimands a court with a "skin letter." But it also has teeth in the back of its head. Although the convening authority may not censure or reprimand any court member or counsel, he is in fact encouraged to prefer charges against them for any procedural error. Now let us limit this dangerous article so that it may not be used as a device to circumvent the very abuse it was intended to correct. Let us limit its application to violations of those articles which are intended to insure prompt and proper disposition of cases and to the provision forbidding the unlawful influence of courts with respect to their judicial functions.

My amendment is substantially the one proposed by General Green. In support thereof he said:

"The amendment is calculated to put teeth into the requirement of the code for prompt and proper disposition of cases and for the provision forbidding the unlawful influence of courts without destroying the freedom of exercise of their judicial functions of courts, counsel, and reviewing authorities. I am afraid that, as written, article 98 would make it possible to punish any member of a court or counsel for the slightest procedural error. It might authorize commanders who are forbidden to censure, reprimand, or admonish courts prefer charges against its members or personnel for such errors as the improper admission or exclusion of evidence, improper action on a challenge, or for finding an accused guilty of an offense not necessarily included in that charged."

Any flagrant violation of other procedural rules, like those for which a lawyer might be disbarred, may be prosecuted under article 134, the general article.

When the hidden implications of article 98 become generally known, I doubt that many young lawyers will seek legal careers in the armed forces.

Amendment D also strikes out of article 18 the power of a general court martial to "adjudge any punishment permitted by the law of war." This particular power is not now in article of war 12 and somehow general courts martial have been able to get along without it. The article already confers upon such courts the power to adjudge any punishment not forbidden by the code, including the penalty of death when specifically authorized by the code. This should certainly suffice the punitive powers of general courts martial without importing new and unknown factors like the law of war. I have searched in vain the hearings before the House committee for an intelligent explanation of what is to be gained by the addition to the punitive powers of a general court martial. (See pp. 958 and 959 of the hearings.) The House committee adopted the language in spite of the doubts, because it was assured that it was in the present Articles of War. I can assure you that it is not.

Lastly my amendment D proposes to strike out of the bill article 29 (a), which provides:

"(a). No member of a general or special court martial shall be absent or excused after the accused has been arraigned except for physical disability or as a result of a challenge or by order of the convening authority for good cause."

Now at first blush that does not appear unreasonable. It certainly is the duty of every member to be present at every session of the court unless he is excused by the convening authority or challenged. If he is not, he is absent without leave from his place of duty and can be punished for violating article 86. But the matter I object to is that the article may make the presence and accounting for each member a jurisdictional prerequisite. If in the course of a long and difficult trial one of the members were to fail to appear, under the section the whole proceedings might well have to be disapproved on jurisdictional grounds despite the fact that more than the minimum number of members now required were present throughout the trial. Emergencies happen in the military service whereby the interest of the Nation might require that a member be excused from the court for other vital duties although the convening authority who might be 1,000 miles away could not be reached. Are we going to force the administration of military justice into a strait-jacket of technical jurisdictional requirements which will impair not only the administration of justice but also the operation of the force. Gentlemen, I assure you that the section adds nothing to the law or practice now in effect except a reason for disapproving proceedings on artificial jurisdictional grounds.

AMENDMENT E

One page 116, beginning with line 20, strike out all down to and including line 13 on page 118 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"ART. 15. Commanding officer's nonjudicial punishment.

"(a) Under such regulations as the President may prescribe, any commanding officer may, in addition to or in lieu of admonition or reprimand, impose one of the following disciplinary punishments for minor offenses without the intervention of a court martial, unless the accused demands trial by court martial—

"(1) upon officers and warrant officers of his command:

"(A) withholding of privileges for a period not to exceed 1 week; or

"(B) restriction to certain specified limits, with or without suspension from duty, for a period not to exceed 1 week; or

"(C) if imposed by an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction, forfeiture of not to exceed one-half of his pay per month for a period not exceeding 1 month;

"(2) upon other military personnel of his command:

"(A) withholding of privileges for a period not to exceed 1 week; or

"(B) restriction to certain specified limits, with or without suspension from duty, for a period not to exceed 1 week; or

"(C) extra duties for a period not to exceed 1 week, and not to exceed 2 hours per day, holidays included; or

"(D) reduction to next inferior grade if the grade from which demoted was established by the command or an equivalent or lower command; or

"(E) if imposed upon a person attached to or embarked in a vessel, confinement for a period not to exceed seven consecutive days.

"(b) The Secretary of a Department may, by regulation, place limitations on the powers granted by this article with respect to the kind and amount of punishment authorized, and the categories of commanding officers authorized to exercise such powers."

On page 121, line 25, beginning with the comma, strike out all down to and including the word "appropriate" on page 122, line 6.

One page 126, line 21, after the word "shall", insert a comma and the following: "without his consent."

One page 126, line 24, beginning with the comma, strike out all down to and including line 5 on page 127.

EXPLANATION

Article 15, nonjudicial punishment: This article is presumably patterned somewhat after the so-called disciplinary power of the commanding officers under article of war 104 of the Kem amendment. Under the article, commanding officers of companies or higher units may impose such punishments as admonition or reprimand, withholding privileges, extra fatigue duty, or restriction to specified limits upon enlisted persons. None of these punishments may be given for a period longer than 1 week from the day imposed. In addition certain commanders may also impose a forfeiture of one-half of a month's pay on officers and warrant officers. Now there is no court martial involved here, but in the Army and Air Force the statute gives every person who considers himself innocent the right to refuse to accept disciplinary punishment and demand a trial by a court martial instead. This is eminently fair. Disciplinary punishment under the Articles of War is relatively minor and is a marvelous way to straighten out a soldier who misbehaves without impairing his usefulness by a stiff court-martial sentence. But if he thinks that he is being unjustly accused of an offense he can demand and get his day in court. That's the way our police courts work—it's the American system of fair play even for minor offenses.

Now that is not the system in the Navy. There is no limit on minor punishments such as withholding of privileges and extra duty, in addition, the Navy also now has confinement for 10 days, confinement on bread and water for 5 days, and solitary confinement for 7 days. Despite the fact that these relics from the log of Captain Bligh are infinitely harsher than the punishment authorized without trial in the Army, the Navy does not give an accused the right to a day in court. The accused is simply haled before the master of the ship at a ceremony known as captain's mast and without being given an opportunity to demand a trial, he may be given 7 days' solitary confinement, or an unlimited amount of time swabbing a deck.

Apparently the Navy won this round, too, when the code was being drafted. This harsh Navy system was adopted with but minor modification—but more detrimental to morale than this harshness is that the unfairness inherent in arbitrary punishment without the right to a day in court was also adopted—subject to departmental regulations. This, the proponents say, will enable the Army to keep its system, and I add, the Navy to keep its harsh and unfair system. I have no doubt that Mr. Gray will leave the Army system as it is—but we must not forget that there once was a Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, whose harshness and arbitrariness is a matter of history. Would a Secretary like Mr. Stanton hesitate for 1 minute to adopt a harsh and arbitrary system of disciplinary punishment if authorized by statute?

It is true that the House ameliorated some of the harsh features of the bill initially introduced and the Senate committee improved it still more. The confinement features and the bread and water was limited to shipboard. I can agree that aboard a ship confinement may occasionally be necessary for disciplinary purposes because restriction alone is not much of a punishment to a person who cannot leave a ship in the middle of the ocean. I propose to leave them this power. But I see no reason why confinement on bread and water for as much as 3 days should be left in the bill. Neither can I see why the minor punishments should be extended to 14 days instead of 7 days.

The feature I object to most in the bill before you, however, is the denial of the right to demand trial unless the Secretary by regulation grant that trial. That is so abhorrent to my sense of fair play that I cannot support it. My amendment leaves things pretty much as they are in the Army and Air Force today except that confinement for 7 days is still authorized for offenses committed by persons embarked upon vessels.

I don't think this will destroy the Navy. I am reminded of the opposition of many naval officers to the abolition of flogging 99 years ago. Somehow the Navy survived.

My position is that, if a man commits an offense for which a more severe punishment than that authorized now in the Army is appropriate, he ought to be tried by a court.

The changes this amendment proposes for article 20, Summary courts martial, are intended to make it consistent with my changes to article 15. A summary court martial is one officer. He acts somewhat like a police court judge except that he also acts as prosecutor and defense counsel as well. He can adjudge confinement for 1 month, hard labor without confinement for 45 days, restriction for 2 months, and forfeiture of two-thirds pay for 1 month.

This article as reported gives every person except those who have been permitted to refuse nonjudicial punishment the right to demand trial before a higher court where he would be entitled to a defense counsel. He could also receive a more severe punishment before a higher court. I have read with interest the comments of General Green with respect to article 20. He said:

"I do not believe it wise to give every accused the absolute right to demand trial by a higher court than a summary court martial. The punitive powers of such higher courts are greater and it is frequently to the advantage of an accused to stand trial before a summary court martial rather than before a general or special court martial. The right to demand trial by a higher court should be reserved to noncommissioned officers, but less well informed soldiers should be protected against their own folly."

He proposed leaving the right to demand trial before a higher court to departmental regulations.

This is one place where I must depart from the views of the general, whose other comments impress me as being extremely sound. In view of the summary nature of such a court, and particularly in view that no defense counsel is provided or authorized, I believe every soldier should have the right, if he desires, to demand a trial before the higher court. It may or may not be folly; he may or may not receive a higher sentence, but perhaps with a defense counsel he may have a much better chance of getting an acquittal than before one officer who is the prosecutor, defense counsel, and judge all in one. I do not agree with General Green that rank or experience should be a criterion affecting this right.

This amendment also guarantees to enlisted persons the right to have soldiers sitting on the court which tries him. This is now the law under the Articles of War as amended by the Kem amendment last year. It has worked remarkably well, I am informed, and I gather from the data collected in the House hearings that soldiers definitely desire the privilege of making an election whether or not they want enlisted persons on the court. The bill as reported whittles down this right by providing that enlisted men may be tried by an all-officer court if "eligible enlisted persons cannot be obtained on account of physical conditions or military exigencies." This strikes me as a patent attempt to circumvent the provision the Congress enacted last year. Certainly enlisted persons should be more plentiful than officers and be more readily available than officers. As I understand it, the excuse is that members of the same unit are not eligible to sit as members of the same court. A unit is defined as "any regularly organized body as defined by the secretary of a department, but in no case shall it be a body larger than a company, a squadron, or a ship's crew, or than a body corresponding to one of them.

When asked on the floor of the House why the exception was made, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee replied that it was calculated to take care of isolated outposts and the crews of small vessels. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland just how small the crew of the U. S. S. Missouri or the carrier Midway is? Now, I understand that the Navy does not very often have a trial aboard a ship. Usually they wait until they reach a base. They can get all sorts of eligible enlisted men on a base. If they must have a trial aboard a vessel, is it so tremendously difficult to get some eligible enlisted persons from another vessel? Let us not whittle away substantial rights on the basis of specious arguments.

AMENDMENT F

On page 129, beginning with line 1, strike out all down to and including line 22 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) Any person who is appointed as trial counsel or defense counsel of a general court-martial shall, if available, be a judge advocate or a law specialist or an officer who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States.

"(c) In any case referred for trial before a general or special court martial in which the officer who is appointed as trial counsel shall be a judge advocate or a law specialist or an officer who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States, the defense counsel appointed by the convening authority shall be one of the foregoing.

"(d) In any case referred for trial before a general or special court martial in which the conduct of the prosecution devolves upon an assistant trial counsel who is a judge advocate or a law specialist or an officer who is a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States, and neither the defense counsel nor any of his assistants or individual counsel present is one of the foregoing, the proceedings will be adjourned pending procurement for the conduct of the defense of a defense counsel who is one of the foregoing, unless the accused expressly consents to proceeding with the trial in the absence of such legally qualified defense counsel."

EXPLANATION

This amendment deals with the provision of article 29 which requires that both trial counsel and defense counsel before every court martial must be members of a State or Federal bar and must be certified as qualified by the Judge Advocate General. My first impression was that this was desirable. However on studying the comments of two men who have studied the problem from both the theoretical and practical standpoints I have changed my mind. Let me quote you General Green's comments:

"3. Mandatory requirement for legal qualification of counsel.

"Article 27 requires that the trial counsel and defense counsel of each general court martial must be a qualified lawyer and certified to be competent to perform his duties by the Judge Advocate General. If their assistants are to perform in any capacity other than in a merely clerical one, they too must be so qualified under article 38.

" AW 11 of the Kem amendment now provides that if the trial judge advocate is a lawyer, the defense counsel must also be a lawyer. This is a fair rule and corrects many of the defects in the former system justly criticized by the public and the legal profession. In the Army we now have approximately 6,000 general court-martial cases per year. In time of war we have many more. I would say that fully 70 percent of these cases involve extremely simple issues which can be adequately and fairly tried by line officers. I would like them tried by lawyers, it is true, but the difficulty of procurement of sufficient lawyers to provide at least 3 for every 1 of 6,000 general court-martial cases is enormous. If I am to certify each one as qualified I will have to satisfy myself that he is qualified to try any kind of a general court-martial case, not just a simple a. w. o. l. or desertion case which rests on a morning report. I can't just certify every lawyer no matter what his trial experience or criminal-law background may be. If bar membership were the only qualification necessary, why would Congress require me to certify the lawyer's qualification? Where can I find lawyers so qualified in sufficient numbers to try 6,000 cases a year? Unless I find them, the few lawyers I have will have to try the cases, simple and difficult, to the exclusion of all other duties which may be more important to the Government than the trial of simple cases which could as effectively be tried by line officers—or lawyers learning military justice. The indievitable result will be long delays in the disposition of cases pending the procurement of three lawyers at the right time and place. Some cases are long and difficult. While a team of three lawyers is trying a case which takes weeks to try—many accused whose cases could be disposed of in an hour or less will be waiting in a guardhouse until their cases can be reached. I don't think this is the result you want to attain. I don't think it's necessary because there will be a trained and experienced law member on the court to see that the rights of the accused are protected in even a simple case. In addition, the review of the staff judge advocate and automatic appellate review will protect the accused's substantial rights against the errors of counsel. The practical difficulties of the article could be ameliorated if you gave the accused, at his option, the right to be defended by a lawyer provided by the appointing authority even though the trial judge advoate is not a lawyer. I would also have no objection if the requirement of the proposed article 27 were limited to cases in which the death penalty or confinement in excess of 10 years might be adjudged."

Now I want to quote the testimony of Col. Frederick Bernams Wiener, a former Assistant Solicitor General, a Reserve officer, and a writer on military justice matters:

"Colonel WIENER. Yes, sir. I come to article 27 (b) of the bill, which makes lawyers mandatory for trial counsel and defense counsel of all general courts martial in the three services. The requirement in the present bill, article of war 11, is that if there is a lawyer for the prosecution, there must be one for the defense. The present bill also makes that requirement for special courts-martial equality; that is written into the new manual for the Army and the Air Force.

"I think it is entirely proper when you have a lawyer for the prosecution that you ought to have one for the defense, although I think it is also fair to point out that the Federal Constitution doesn't require that sort of thing in the States. There has been a persistent drive to get the Supreme Court to hold that the fourteenth amendment requires a State to provide counsel for an indigent prisoner in all circumstances; and up until now that attempt has failed. The cases are Betts v. Brady (316 U. S.) and Butt v. Illinois (332 U. S.).

"The Supreme Court has never gone that far.

"While the equality provision is sound and makes for a greater fairness, the mandatory provision for lawyers for defense counsel and prosecution in every general court martial, such as this bill provides in article 27 (b), is, in my judgment, unnecessary and thoroughly impractical.

"Now, I will document those characterizations.

"It is unnecessary because a lot of your cases that go before general courts are really police-court cases. A man goes a. w. o. l. for more than 6 months. That is prima facie desertion and it is going to be tried by general court.

"A soldier steals a watch worth $50. That is a general court case.

"Now, I used to think, why is it necessary to try petty thieves by general court martial in the service? The answer is that nothing so quickly disrupts the morale as a sneak thief in a barracks. Even if he just takes a pack of cigarettes, you have to stamp that out. Cases like that, desertion, the simple cases of disobedience of orders, the simple larcenies, those are not cases that require two trained lawyers on both sides.

"In fact, in time of peace, in the British Colonial courts, cases like that are prosecuted by police officers and sometimes even by the native police sergeants. You just don't need a law school education to try or defend that kind of a case.

"It is worse than unnecessary; it is impractical. You cannot get, in time of peace, the number of lawyers that this bill would require. You cannot get them for the services. I can speak on that with some degree of assurance because last summer I was on duty, active duty in the War Department, and one of my assignments was to study the problem, the personnel problem for the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army under the provisions of the Elston bill. Where would they get the lawyers in time of peace to be permanent commissioned career officers of the Army to try every case by general court?

"Mr. ELSTON. How would you draw a distinction between what is and what is not a serious case?

"Colonel WIENER. I would leave it as you have it in the present bill, 'if available,' and leave it to the good judgment of the staff judge advocate to decide whether he needs a lawyer on both sides. After all, the normal run of cases never reaches the commanding general except for the final approval. It is handled by the staff judge advocate.

"Now, if I have a case of murder and I am staff judge advocate, I will see that a lawyer prosecutes and, of course, that means I have to get a lawyer to defend. On the other hand, if it is a simple desertion, or someone just told the officer that he wouldn't go out and dig the ditch, you can get any bright young lieutenant. In time of war, I agree it is a horrible shocking waste of military manpower to take a line officer for those details. In time of war, you can get all the lawyers you want. In time of peace, you just cannot get the lawyers. Now, the lawyers in the Army are almost as difficult to get as doctors are. They just don't come.

"Congress has done nothing to make the career of the regular judge advocate more attractive. As of the first of this year, they cut his pay by taking away the tax exemption. They have given him a single promotion list, but that list doesn't give him any faster promotion than he had since the Officer Personnel Act was passed. It is just extremely difficult to get the lawyers you need.

"Now, if you make it a mandatory requirement that everybody who prosecutes a desertion case at every Army post in the United States, at every naval base in the United States, at every Air Force base in the United States, where are you going to get those lawyers in time of peace as permanent career people?

"Mr. HARDY. You may have a practical difficulty involved there, but aren't you running a right serious risk that the accused may not get justice out of the thing, and there may be an element of prejudice involved?

"Colonel WIENER. No, sir; and I will tell you why: Because if you have a lawyer for the prosecution, you still have to have a lawyer for the defense. If you have a layman for the prosecution, that is, a young infantry officer, a young artilleryman, a young non-flying Air Force officer, you have a similar person on the defense. You don't run into any danger. An ordinary desertion case, what is there to it?

"Mr. HARDY. How do you distinguish as to who is going to distinguish between the ordinary desertion case and one that may be somewhat involved?

"Colonel WIENER. The staff judge advocate because before he recommends that the case go to trial, he has seen the transcript of evidence, or it is a simple case of putting in a report and showing the apprehension a year later.

"Mr. HARDY. I have had several cases in my own district where I don't think justice was reaped out to them, and there was at least one lawyer on the court.

"Colonel WIENER. I am saying in time of peace, with this bill, you won't get the lawyers. What are you going to do if you don't get the lawyers to try these cases? Either you can't get them tried or they all get out on habeas corpus later. You are up against a practical problem. Where are you going to get the lawyers for your peacetime armed services to try and defend every case by general court martial?

"If, by making the career sufficiently attractive, by raising the pay, by giving them even more promotion rights, and so forth, you do attract that kind of lawyer, is it a good use of your military dollar?

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Colonel, you said a minute ago you had to have lawyers in certain cases.

"Colonel WIENER. Yes.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Like murder cases.

"Colonel WIENER. Yes.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Why couldn't those same lawyers handle the larceny cases?

"Colonel WIENER. Because the lawyer you get to try the murder cases normally processes claims, reviews boards, and does other legal work, and you get him to try one case. You can't get him to try all the general court-martial cases tried in the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. I could conceive of a larceny case being a very serious case.

"Colonel WIENER. There is no question about that.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. It seems to me a man's rights in a larceny case, especially a grand larceny case, should be protected equally as well as in a murder case.

"Colonel WIENER. My point is, wher you have a grand larceny case, you have the man who is the PX steward, you have the money missing from the safe, you have the money found under his mattress, I say, as a matter of experience in reviewing and handling those cases, you don't need a lawyer to prosecute that PX steward.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Haven't you a good many involved cases of law come up when grand larceny cases come up?

"Colonel WIENER. Yes, but ever since the amendment to the ninety-third article last year, which took out the distinction between larceny and embezzlement, most of those are gone. The easiest way for a thief to get loose in the Army, before the Elston bill, was to commit an offense that was on the borderline between larceny and embezzlement; and if the staff judge advocate guessed one way, that it was larceny, and the board of review guessed the other way, that it was embezzlement, the fellow went scot free. That has been stopped. 'He that takes what is not his'n; he shall certainly go to prison.'

"When the case is not simple, it is up to the staff judge advocate. You don't need a lawyer to try it. Where are you going to get these lawyers? I had to study the problem last summer, and you just can't get the lawyers; and when you can get them, when you can get these thousands of lawyers for the armed services just to try what really are police court cases, are you really spending your military dollar wisely; when, as I understand it, one of the real problems on the 70-group Air Force is that it is going to cost an awful lot of spending money.

"So that to make this a mandatory requirement in time of peace that every general court-martial case has got to have two lawyers on prosecution and defense, it is not necessary; it is not practical. Now, in wartime it is different. In wartime, lawyers are literally a dime a dozen; any and every lawyer wants to get into the service; and it is a shame to take a doughboy, who ought to be training his platoon, or an artilleryman, who ought to be studying up on the tables, and make him try cases. Use the lawyers for that in wartime.

"To make it mandatory in time of peace, you are going to make it impossible for these cases to get tried. With your shortage of lawyers, we haven't got the lawyers, and here we have all these cases, and we have to try them by special court, which frequently will defeat this bill.

"Mr. BROOKS. Colonel, let me ask you a question on that point. What would you think of handling it as it is handled ordinarily in civilian courts, permit the accused, the defendant to ask for counsel when he wants it, and the court to appoint it?

"Colonel WIENER. Well, the Army has been way in advance of that for years. Ever since 1920, anybody appointing a general or a special court has had to appoint defense counsel. In a number of respects, you know, the 1920 Articles did much more for an accused than the civil courts did. They always gave him counsel. It may not have been the most competent counsel, but he had someone there to speak for him. Civil courts didn't always do that. It gave him a transcript of the record; and until the court reporter bill, about 1943, you never got that in the civil courts unless you could pay for it; and they gave him automatic appellate review in every case; and the civil courts didn't give you that.

"I have been in Federal courts down in Alabama. I was trying a case in Anniston once. The case ahead of mine involved some bootleggers. The 'revenoor' was on the stand, the witness against them; the defendant would take the stand in his own behalf; no transcript; charge to the jury; the jury would come out, bring back the verdict; the man had no lawyer, except someone such as the young fellow the court would appoint, no record, and, of course, he couldn't take an appeal.

"Now, the fellow tried for desertion in the Army system would have had a lawyer, would have had a written record, and would have had his record reviewed on appeal by trained people, without his asking for it or without his spending any money. So that the accused, under the Army Articles of War, has had a great many safeguards.

"I am just saying, gentlemen, the present provision of the Elston bill, 'if available,' yes. If you have the lawyers, by all means, use them. If you have a lawyer on the prosecution, you have to balance the thing and make the odds fair by having one for the defense.

"Mr. BROOKS. By the same token, in civilian courts, if you get into a local city or local court, they don't provide lawyers for each defendant.

"Colonel WIENER. The Constitution says, as now interpreted in Betts v. Brady and Butts v. Illinois, that the State doesn't have to furnish them. The Federal Government said that the sixth amendment does require it.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. A great many States have to furnish them in capital cases and not in noncapital cases.

"Colonel WIENER. Oh, yes; and my point is, when you have a case that the staff judge advocate feels a lawyer should prosecute, you have to have a lawyer for the defense.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. In all civil cases that I have seen tried in Alabama, there is always a defense counsel appointed to represent the defendant, if he cannot retain one himself.

"Colonel WIENER. Since 1938, Johnson v. Zirks, (304 U. S.), they had to appoint them; but nobody ever supposed so before.

"Mr. ELSTON. They always appoint them in Ohio, in the Federal courts and State courts, too. Any person indicted by a grand jury gets counsel appointed by the court if unable to employ counsel; and in Federal courts they are always appointed for any person charged by indictment or information.

"Mr. BROOKS. That is more or less the general rule. In local city courts, municipal courts, that rule doesn't obtain in certain areas I know.

"Mr. ELSTON. Of course, there is no provision in the military code for the appointment of counsel in summary court-martial cases, and police court more or less corresponds to summary report.

"Colonel WIENER. All I am doing is urging you gentlemen not to put into effect as a strait-jacket a requirement which isn't necessary, in fact, and which, in time of peace, would just make it utterly impossible. I mean, you are going to have to appropriate money to hire these lawyers to try GCM cases.

"Mr. ELSTON. Don't you think an accused person is entitled to counsel in any case wherein he may receive a dishonorable discharge upon conviction?

"Colonel WIENER. He gets counsel.

"Mr. ELSTON. Well, he may.

"Colonel WIENER. He gets counsel.

"Mr. ELSTON. He does get counsel, but you are saying that——

"Colonel WIENER. And he gets a lawyer if the man prosecuting him is a lawyer. All I am saying is, don't make it mandatory for the services to provide lawyers on both sides of every general court case.

"Mr. ELSTON. In any general court-martial conviction, there can be a dishonorable discharge?

"Colonel WIENER. That is correct.

"Mr. ELSTON. So how does it help the accused any if neither side has a lawyer?

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. Suppose he is tried on hearsay testimony or just any kind of testimony?

"Colonel WIENER. Well, in the first place, the lay trial judge advocate trying a case will prepare his case sufficiently that he doesn't get hearsay in. In the second place, under the Elston bill you have a trained lawyer as law member who will rule out hearsay; and in the third place, you have his rulings reviewed by the staff judge advocate and by the board of review; and the rule in military law is that failure to object doesn't constitute a waiver. So that in actual practice the possibility of a man going out on hearsay testimony, getting a D. D. on hearsay, is so remote as to not be a possibility.

"Oh, it may have happened once; yes. We have had a Federal judge go to jail for bribery. That doesn't mean we can impugn the integrity of the judicial system.

"Gentlemen, you are going to have to appropriate an awful lot of money to supply the lawyers that will be necessary to run the simple cases, desertions, and the small larcenies, and the disobedience cases, if this bill goes through.

"Now, I would like to turn to the judicial council of three civilians. I don't think it is sound; I don't think it is necessary; and I think it is wholly self-defeating; and I will document those characterizations.

"In the first place, you don't provide for Senate confirmation. You don't give fixed terms. The result is that these people will be subject to all sorts of pressure; personal pressure, political pressure.

"Mr. DEGRAFFENRIED. What article are you discussing now?

"Colonel WIENER. Article 67.

"Mr. ELSTON. I think, Colonel, it is going to follow, as a matter of course, if this is adopted, the committee will recommend a certain term and confirmation by the Senate. I am only speaking for myself, but I know in all probability, no member of the committee would want to leave anything as indefinite as that.

"Mr. BROOKS. You needn't worry, the Senate will put it in.

"Colonel WIENER. All right, assuming they do. You are setting up a specialized court instead of a court of general jurisdiction; and you are staffing it with civilians. Now, the fact of the matter is—and I think we should face it frankly—that the appointments to the specialized courts of our judicial system haven't attracted the same sort of talent that the courts of general jurisdiction have attracted. Some of our experiences with the United States Commerce Court have been rather unfortunate.

"However, I think the basic difficulty is the notion that this court shall be composed of civilians. I suppose, simon-pure civilians. I don't know whether, under these provisions, a Reserve officer would be deemed contaminated by his prior service or present status, and so not eligible for this civilian court. But, more important, you take three civilians, three high-minded civilians, learned in the law, and they have the powers that it is proposed to give them in this bill, and first, they come up against a case like that of Gen. Fitzjohn Porter, who wasn't too successful at the Second Battle of Bull Run or, certainly, for the benefit of the chairman, the Second Battle of Manassas."

My view, after reading the foregoing, is that the provisions of the mandatory lawyer provision will delay trials to such an extent that it will work a tremendous hardship on most accused persons. I would like the armed forces to procure the necessary lawyers first, before we enact the proposed provision. If they get the lawyers, I'll be all for it—but let us hold this is abeyance until such time as they have the lawyer. The present system requiring equalization on each side is satisfactory and fair enough. My section (d) plugs any loophole that may have existed under the Kem amendment, by requiring that if an assistant trial judge advocate who is a lawyer conducts the case, the officer conducting the defense must also be a lawyer unless the accused waives his right to such counsel. I might say that this comes out of paragraph 6 of the present manual for courts martial which plugged the hole left by the statute.

AMENDMENT G

ART. 28. Appointment of reporters and interpreters.

Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Department may prescribe, the president of a court martial or military commission or a court of inquiry shall have power to appoint a reporter, who shall record the proceedings of and testimony taken before such court or commission. Under like regulations the president of a court martial, military commission, or court of inquiry may appoint an interpreter who shall interpret for the court or commission.

EXPLANATION

This amendment was proposed by General Green in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee. I quote his comment:

"The proposed article 28 of H. R. 4080 provides that the convening authority, instead of the president of the court, shall have power to appoint the reporter and interpreter. This provision may prove cumbersome with respect to courts sitting at a great distance from the headquarters of a convening authority. The need for an interpreter or a change in reporters may arise suddenly during the course of a trial. It is most convenient to vest the power to appoint reporters in some authority on the spot and not in someone who may be 500 miles away."

It seems obvious to me that if the commanding general of the army with headquarters in Chicago appoints a court martial to sit at Fort Francis P. Warren, Wyo., it is absurd to get his specific authority for any change in court reporters which may be necessary or to hire an interpreter during the course of the trial. My amendment is consistent with the present Articles of War. Has anyone ever heard of one instance where there has been alleged an abuse of the power of a president of the court to appoint a reporter or an interpreter? Because of small errors like this in the bill as reported, I am convinced that no one who has had any real experience in the administration of military justice had a hand in drafting this bill. The Military Establishment should have drawn upon the knowledge and experience of those who are daily occupied in the dispensing of military justice before approving these changes. By analogy, the situation is similar to one in which the Military Establishment would approve a code for the Medical Corps in all services, minutely describing the procedure to be followed in performing the most delicate operations, and approving such a code drawn up by armchair strategists who were not experienced in daily medical practice.

AMENDMENT H

On page 140, beginning with line 3, strike out all down to and including line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) Except as otherwise provided in this article, a person shall not be liable to be tried by court martial for desertion in time of peace or any of the offenses punishable under articles 119 through 132, inclusive, if the offense was committed more than 3 years before the charges therefor are referred for trial.

"(c) Except as otherwise provided in this article, a person shall not be liable to be tried by court martial for an offense committed more than 2 years before the charges therefor are referred for trial, nor may he be punished under article 15 for an offense committed more than 2 years before the imposition of such punishment.

"(d) Periods in which the accused was absent from territory in which the United States has the authority to apprehend him, or in the custody of civil authorities other than Federal civil authorities, or in the hands of the enemy, shall be excluded in computing the period of limitation prescribed in this article."

EXPLANATION

This amendment deals with the statute of limitations, article 43. The bill as reported has 2 pages devoted to the statute of limitations but, if the sleepers are considered, there isn't any statute of limitations left.

Under article of war 39, applying to the Army and Air Force, the statute of limitations stops at a very definite point, arraignment. Under article 43 of the Uniform Code it stops, of all places, when sworn charges are received by an officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction. This is a very nebulous stage of the proceedings and there is really nothing to prevent such charges from simply resting on ice, for years perhaps, before someone decides to bring them to trial—especially when the witnesses for the defense have disappeared. It's an open invitation to fraudulent back-dating of charges—and it eliminates any certainty on the part of an accused as to what his rights under the statute of limitations may be. I have examined the House hearings and I find that there is an enormous amount of confusion on the subject. See pages 1031–1046; 1264–1265. I think I detected a lack of sympathy for the basic idea of a statute of limitations. Now if you want to abolish the limitations let's do it frankly and openly—I think there's a sound reason for limitations and our civilian practice makes liberal use of it.

I think the Judge Advocate General of the Army knows whereof he speaks on the subject. This is what he said:

"Article 43 (b) of H. R. 4080 provides a 3-year statute of limitations for peacetime desertion, felonies of a civil nature, and frauds against the Government. The time when the period of limitation will stop running is made the time when sworn charges are received by an officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction. Under article of war 39 the time when the statute stops running is arraignment.

"In the Army an officer exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction frequently exercises special or general court-martial jurisdiction. He may be a field artillery battalion commander, or he might be an army commander. Under article 43 (b), H. R. 4080, such an officer might receive charges appropriate for trial before a higher court which he has authority to appoint. He is under no duty to forward them to anyone else. He might simply decide that the charges do not merit trial and file them. Such charges might later be resurrected. Since officers exercising summary court martial are not courts of records with dockets, time stamps, etc., which civilian lawyers are accustomed to in the office of clerk of a court of record, I believe that the proposed statute of limitations is fraught with danger of serious abuse. I prefer that the statute of limitations stop running at a more definite stage of the proceedings. I believe that reference for trial is such a definite stage. It must come after an investigation into the nature of the charges and the available evidence, after consideration of the staff judge advocate, and after the determination of the responsible commander that there should be a trial. This is consistent with the Federal statute of limitations which stops running after the indictment is found or the information is instituted (18 U. S. C. 3282).

"It has been contended in favor of article 43 (b) that stopping the running of statute of limitations at arraignment might prevent the bringing of a fugitive to trial. I believe that article 43 (d) provides ample safeguards for the contingency. Furthermore, there is no reason why a case cannot be referred for trial even though the accused is a fugitive. It cannot be tried until he is found, it is true, but it is better to keep it in suspension after an investigation than before."

As I read the testimony of the proponents before the House committee I see that it is supposed to be a compromise between Army and Navy practices. In the Navy the statute runs when charges are preferred, but under Navy practice charges are not preferred until after there is an investigation. In the Army there is an investigation after charges are forwarded to an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction. So it seems to me that the compromise, if any, was to shove back the time when the statute stops running to a point before the point where the Navy's statute now stops running. If we adopt General Green's suggestions embodied in my amendment we will leave the stopping point about where it now is in the Navy and exactly where it is in the Federal courts. It will be a definite point, not subject to abuse or fraud.

My amendment to 43 (d) is also based on General Green's suggestions.

"Article 43 (d) of H. R. 4080 attempts to define 'manifest impediment' to amenability to military jurisdiction provided in article of war 39. It would include periods during which the accused is in the custody of Federal authorities. I believe this is unjust, since he would be amenable to military process if the United States desires to make him so amenable. Accordingly, I recommend that periods during which an accused is in Federal custody be not excluded from the running of the statute of limitations."

AMENDMENT I

On page 141, beginning with line 23, strike out all down to and including line 11 on page 142, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

ART. 44. Former jeopardy.

No person shall, without his consent, be tried a second time for the same offense; but no proceeding in which an accused has been found guilty by a court martial upon any charge and specification shall, as to such charge and specification, be held to be a trial in the sense of this article until the findings of guilty have become final after review of the case has been fully completed; nor shall any proceeding which has been terminated before findings on the general issue be held to be a trial in the sense of this article unless evidence on the general issue has been received by the court martial and the hearing has been terminated for a reason other than manifest necessity in the interest of justice.

EXPLANATION

Article 44. Former jeopardy: (c) This section added by the Senate committee is intended according to the report to cover the precise factual situation presented by Wade v. Hunter (336 U. S. 684). It is, however, badly drawn, and in view of the failure to punctuate the section, makes it difficult to determine whether dismissal or termination by the convening authority would constitute a trial only where such action is taken for failure of available evidence or witnesses—or whether the phrase is intended to modify motions of the prosecution only. In any event this provision would freeze into the law the mechanical concept of jeopardy expressed in Cornero v. United States (48 F. 2d 69). This view was expressly rejected by the United States Supreme Court in the Wade case:

"The district court viewed the record as showing that the only purpose of dissolving the court martial was to get more witnesses. This purpose, the district court held, was not the kind of 'imperious' or 'urgent necessity' that came within the recognized exception to the double-jeopardy provision. See Cornero v. United States (48 F. 2d 69). We are urged to apply the Cornero interpretation of the 'urgent necessity' rule here. We are asked to adopt the Cornero rule under which petitioner contends the absence of witnesses can never justify discontinuance of a trial. Such a rigid formula is inconsistent with the guiding principles of the Perez decision to which we adhere. Those principles command courts in considering whether a trial should be terminated without judgment to take 'all circumstances into account' and thereby forbid the mechanical application of an abstract formula. The value of the Perez principles thus lies in their capacity for informed application under widely different circumstances without injury to defendants or to the public interests" (Wade v. Hunter, supra, 691).

The Supreme Court unambiguously adopted the rule of the Perez case:

"The rule announced in the Perez case has been the basis for all later decisions of this Court on double jeopardy. It attempts to lay down no rigid formula. Under the rule a trial can be discontinued when particular circumstances manifest a necessity for so doing, and when failure to discontinue would defeat the ends of justice. We see no reason why the same broad test should not be applied in deciding whether court-martial action runs counter to the fifth amendment's provision against double jeopardy" (Wade v. Hunter, supra, 690).

My amendment would clearly adopt the broad rule of the Wade case, applicable to all interruptions of a trial by court martial and not freeze it inartfully to the specific factual situation of that case.

AMENDMENT J

On page 150, beginning with line 5, strike out all down to and including line 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Each general court martial shall keep a separate record of its proceedings in the trial of each case brought before it, and such record shall be authenticated by the signature of the president and the trial counsel. In case the record cannot be authenticated by the president and trial counsel, by reason of the death, disability, or absence of either or both of them, it shall be signed by a member in lieu of the president and by an assistant trial counsel if there be one, in lieu of the trial counsel, otherwise by another member of the court."

EXPLANATION

My amendment to article 54 (d) preserves the method of authenticating record of trial now used in the Army and the Air Force.

The bill as reported provides that the president and "law officer" shall authenticate records but under article 38 the trial counsel prepared the record. He ought to be in a better position than any one to know the accuracy of the record. Therefore he ought to authenticate it along with some member of the court. This could be the president or the law member. I have chosen the president consistently with the law as it is today.

AMENDMENT K

On page 152, beginning with line 9, strike out all down to and including line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) Under such instructions as the Department concerned may prescribe, any sentence to confinement adjudged by a court martial or other military tribunal may be carried into execution by confinement in any place of confinement under the control of an armed force: Provided, That any sentence to confinement which includes dishonorable discharge or dismissal not suspended and any sentence to confinement adjudged against a civilian may be carried into execution in any penal or correctional institution under the control of the United States or a Territory, district, or possession thereof. Persons so confined in a penal or correctional institution not under the control of an armed force shall be subject to the same discipline and treatment as persons confined or committed by the courts of the United States, or of the Territory, district, or possession of the United States in which the institution is situated."

EXPLANATION

Article 58. Execution of confinement: Under the present article of war 42 a convicted accused may be sent to a Federal penitentiary only for serious offenses for which confinement in excess of 1 year is authorized by title 18 of the United States Code or the law of the District of Columbia. Other offenses are punishable by confinement in a disciplinary barracks or guardhouse. This bill (art. 58 (a)) provides that, subject to departmental regulation, any accused, no matter what his offense might be, and no matter how long his sentence to confinement, or whether accompanied by a bad-conduct discharge or not, may be confined "in any penal or correctional institution under the control of the United States, or which the United States may be allowed to use."

This means that any soldier, convicted of a short absence without leave, or disrespect to an officer can be sent to a United States penitentiary, or correctional institution with all the opprobrium and lasting effect upon his reputation that penitentiary confinement incurs. Penitentiary confinement is recognized by the Supreme Court as "infamous punishment" (Ex parte Arlson, 114 U. S. 417; Parkinson v. U. S. (121 U. S. 281); U. S. v. DeWalt (128 U. S. 393)). In the case of Medly, petitioner (139 U. S. 169) the Supreme Court said that the disgrace of confinement in a penitentiary pending execution of the death penalty was adding to the punishment in violation of the ex post facto provision of the Constitution, when imposed in a case where the defense was committed at a time when the law provided for confinement in a county jail pending execution. That's how serious penitentiary confinement is regarded by the Supreme Court, yet the armed services want to confine soldiers there even while they remain soldiers.

But this is not the worst feature of the article. What are these places "which the United States may be allowed to use"?

Would they include State chain gangs, foreign prisons, Devil's Island, perhaps? Certainly they would if the State or foreign government allows the military authorities to use them. Now it may be said that the draftsmen had no such intent in mind. I will agree to that—but the road to hell is paved with good intentions. If we give the services this power some commander some day will abuse it.

Perhaps the proponents will argue that foreign prisons cannot be used because under article 12 no member of the armed forces may be placed in confinement in immediate association with foreign nationals.

But if they are placed outside the custody of an armed force they cease to be persons subject to this code and they are no longer members of the armed forces under article 2 (7).

I propose to strike the authority to confine anybody in any State or foreign prison, and authorize confinement only in Federal places of confinement or those under the control of territory, district, or possession of the United States. I also propose that any persons who are no longer soldiers, that is, those who have been dishonorably discharged, may be confined in such a Federal institution and that others remain in the hands of the armed forces in disciplinary barracks, rehabilitation centers and similar places where they can be rehabilitated as soldiers.

AMENDMENT L

On page 155, beginning with line 12, strike out all down to and including line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) If the convening authority or confirming authority disapproves a sentence or when any sentence is vacated by action of the board of review or judicial council and the judge advocate general, or by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, the disapproving or vacating authority may, except where there is lack of sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings, order or authorize a rehearing, in which case such authority shall state the reasons for disapproval or vacation."

On page 156, after line 4, insert the following: "No sentence of a court martial shall be carried into execution unless it has been approved by the convening authority."

On page 156, beginning with line 19, strike out all down to and including line 5 on page 157, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) Where the sentence of a special court martial as approved by the convening authority includes a bad-conduct discharge the record shall be forwarded to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction over the command for action under articles 61 and 64 as in the case of a record of trial by general court martial. If the sentence as approved by an officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction includes a bad-conduct discharge, whether or not suspended, the record shall be forwarded to the appropriate Judge Advocate General to be reviewed by a board of review."

On page 157, beginning with line 12, strike out all down to and including line 11 on page 166, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"ART. 66. Appellate review in the Office of The Judge Advocate General.

"(a) Board of review; judicial council: The Judge Advocate General shall constitute, in his office, a board of review composed of not less than three judge advocates or law specialists. He shall also constitute, in his office, a judicial council composed of three general or flag officers who are judge advocates or law specialists: Provided, That the Judge Advocate General may, under exigent circumstances, detail as members of the judicial council, for periods not in excess of 60 days, judge advocates or law specialists of grades below that of general or flag officers: Provided further, That the general counsel of the Treasury may detail as members of the board of review of the Coast Guard civilian members of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States, and he may detail as members of the judicial council of the Coast Guard law specialist of grades below that of flag officer or civilian members of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State of the United States, whenever the Coast Guard is not operating as a part of the Navy.

"(b) Additional boards of review and judicial councils: Whenever necessary, the Judge Advocate General may constitute two or more boards of review and judicial councils in his office, with equal powers and duties, composed as provided in the first paragraph of this article.

"(c) Action by board of review when approval by President or confirming action is required. Before any record of trial in which there has been adjudged a sentence requiring approval or confirmation by the President or confirmation by any other confirming authority is submitted to the President or such other confirming authority, as the case may be, it shall be examined by the Board of Review which shall take action as follows:

"(1) In any case requiring action by the President, the Board of Review shall submit its opinion in writing, through the judicial council which shall also submit its opinion in writing, to the Judge Advocate General, who shall, except as herein otherwise provided, transmit the record and the board's and council's opinions, with his recommendations, directly to the Secretary of the Department for the action of the President: Provided, That the judicial council, with the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General, shall have powers in respect to holdings of legal insufficiency equal to the powers vested in the board of review by subparagraph (3) of this paragraph.

"(2) In any case requiring confirming action by the judicial council with or without the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General, when the Board of Review is of the opinion that the record of trial is legally sufficient to support the sentence it shall submit its opinion in writing to the judicial council for appropriate action.

"(3) When the board of review is of the opinion that the record of trial in any case requiring confirming action by the President or confirming action by the judicial council is legally insufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, or the sentence, or that errors of law have been committed injuriously affecting the substantial rights of the accused, it shall submit its holding to the Judge Advocate General and when the Judge Advocate General concurs in such holding, such findings and sentence shall thereby be vacated in accord with such holding and the record shall be transmitted by the Judge Advocate General to the appropriate convening authority for a rehearing or such other action as may be proper.

"(4) In any case requiring confirming action by the President or confirming action by the judicial council in which the board of review holds the record of trial legally insufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, or the sentence, and the Judge Advocate General shall not concur in the holding of the board of review, the holding and the record of trial shall be transmitted to the judicial council for confirming action or for other appropriate action in a case in which confirmation of the sentence by the President is required under article 70.

"(d) Action by board of review in cases involving dishonorable or bad-conduct discharges or confinement for 1 year or more.—No authority shall order the execution of any sentence of a court martial involving dishonorable discharge not suspended, bad-conduct discharge not suspended, or confinement for 1 year or more unless and until the appellate review required by this article shall have been completed and unless and until any confirming action required shall have been completed. Every record of trial by general or special court martial involving a sentence to dishonorable discharge or bad-conduct discharge, whether such discharges be suspended or not suspended, and every record of trial by general court martial involving a sentence to confinement for 1 year or more, other than records of trial examination of which is required by subsection (d) of this article, shall be examined by the board of review which shall take action as follows:

"(1) In any case in which the board of review holds the record of trial legally sufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, and confirming action is not by the Judge Advocate General or the board of review deemed necessary, the Judge Advocate General shall transmit the holding to the convening authority, and such holding shall be deemed final and conclusive.

"(2) In any case in which the board of review holds the record of trial legally sufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, but modification of the findings of guilty or the sentence is by the Judge Advocate General or the board of review deemed necessary to the ends of justice, the holding and the record of trial shall be transmitted to the judicial council for confirming action.

"(3) In any case in which the board of review holds the record of trial legally insufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, in whole or in part, and the Judge Advocate General concurs in such holding, the findings and sentence shall thereby be vacated in whole or in part in accord with such holding, and the record shall be transmitted by the Judge Advocate General to the convening authority for rehearing or such other action as may be appropriate.

"(4) In any case in which the board of review holds the record of trial legally insufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, in whole or in part, and the Judge Advocate General shall not concur in the holding of the board of review, the holding and the record of trial shall be transmitted to the judicial council for confirming action.

"(e) Appellate action in other cases: Every record of trial by general court martial the appellate review of which is not otherwise provided for by this article shall be examined in the office of the Judge Advocate General and if found legally insufficient to support the findings of guilty and sentence, in whole or in part, shall be transmitted to the board of review for appropriate action in accord with subsection (d) of this article.

"(f) Weighing evidence: In the appellate review of records of trials by courts martial as provided in these articles the Judge Advocate General and all appellate agencies in his office shall have authority to weigh evidence, judge the credibility of witnesses, and determine controverted questions of fact.

"ART. 67. Branch offices.

"Whenever the President deems such action necessary, he may direct the Judge Advocate General to establish a branch office, under an Assistant Judge Advocate General who shall be a general or flag officer who is a judge advocate or law specialist, with any distant command, and to establish in such branch office one or more boards of review and judicial councils composed as provided in article 66. Such Assistant Judge Advocate General and such board of review and judicial council shall be empowered to perform for that command under the general supervision of the Judge Advocate General, the duties which the Judge Advocate General and the board of review and judicial council in his office would otherwise be required to perform in respect of all cases involving sentences not requiring approval or confirmation by the President: Provided, That the power of mitigation and remission shall not be exercised by such Assistant Judge Advocate General, but any case in which such action is deemed desirable shall be forwarded to the Judge Advocate General with appropriate recommendations.

"ART. 68. Review by United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"(a) In any case transmitted to them for action pursuant to article 66 or article 70, in which an issue of uniformity of interpretation or construction of the code may arise, the President, the Secretary of a Department, or the Judge Advocate General is authorized to certify the record of trial to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia for action pursuant to this article, prior to taking action thereon pursuant to article 70 or article 66, respectively.

"(b) Under such rules of procedure as it shall prescribe the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia shall review the records in any case certified to it pursuant to subsection (a) of this article.

"(c) In any case reviewed by it, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia shall act only with respect to the findings and sentence as approved by the convening authority and only with respect to the issues raised by the authority who has certified the record to it. It shall take action only with respect to matters of law.

"(d) When the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia is of the opinion that a record of trial is legally sufficient to support the findings of guilty in whole or in part, it shall transmit its opinion in writing to the authority who has certified the record to it for completion of action pursuant to article 66 or article 70.

"(e) When the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia is of the opinion that a record of trial is legally insufficient to support the findings of guilty and the sentence in whole or in part, such findings of guilty and such sentence or such part of a sentence shall thereby be vacated. If the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia sets aside the entire sentence, it may, except where the setting aside is based on lack of sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings of guilty, authorize a rehearing. Otherwise, it shall order that the charges be dismissed, if the court has authorized a rehearing, but the convening authority finds a rehearing impractical, he may dismiss the charges.

"(f) (1) The Judge Advocate General shall appoint in his office one or more officers as appellate Government counsel, and one or more officers as appellate defense counsel who shall possess the same qualifications as a law member under the provisions of article 26.

"(2) It shall be the duty of appellate Government counsel to represent the United States before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in any case transmitted to such court under the provisions of this article, when directed to do so by the Judge Advocate General.

"(3) It shall be the duty of appellate defense counsel to represent the accused before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in any case transmitted to such court under the provisions of this article.

"(4) Whenever a case is transmitted to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia under the provisions of this article it shall be the duty of the Judge Advocate General to notify the accused that the case has been so transmitted and such notification shall be given promptly in order that the accused may have an opportunity to select civilian counsel to represent him before such court. The accused shall have the right to be represented before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia by civilian counsel, if provided by him.

"ART. 69. Advisory Council on Military Justice.

"There is hereby established in the National Military Establishment an Advisory Council on Military Justice which shall consist of not more than five members who shall be appointed from civilian life by the Secretary of Defense. No person shall be eligible for appointment to the Advisory Council on Military Justice who is not a member of the bar of a Federal court or of the highest court of a State. The council and the Judge Advocate Generals of the armed forces shall meet at least twice annually to make a comprehensive survey of the operation of the code and to report to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and to the Secretary of Defense and the Secretaries of the Departments the number and status of pending cases and any recommendations relating to uniformity of sentence policies, amendments to this code, and any other matters deemed appropriate.

"ART. 70. Confirmation.

"In addition to the approval required by article 64 and subject to the provisions of article 68, confirmation is required as follows before the sentence of a court-martial may be carried into execution, namely:

"(a) By the President with respect to any sentence—

"(1) of death; or

"(2) involving a general or flag officer: Provided, That when the President has already acted as approving authority, no additional confirmation by him is necessary;

"(b) By the Secretary of a department with respect to any sentence not requiring approval or confirmation by the President, when the Judge Advocate General does not concur in the action of the judicial council;

"(c) By the judicial council, with the concurrence of the Judge Advocate General, with respect to any sentence—

"(1) when the confirming action of the judicial council is not unanimous, or when by direction of the Judge Advocate General his participation in the confirming action is required; or

"(2) involving imprisonment for life; or

"(3) involving the dismissal or reduction to the lowest enlisted grade of an officer other than a general or flag officer; or

"(4) involving the dismissal or suspension of a cadet or midshipman;

"(d) By the judicial council with respect to any sentence in a case transmitted to the judicial council under the provisions of article 66 for confirming action.

"ART. 71. Powers incident to power to confirm.

"The power to confirm the sentence of a court-martial shall be held to include—

"(a) the power to approve, confirm, or disapprove a finding of guilty, and to approve or confirm so much only of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense;

"(b) the power to confirm, disapprove, vacate, commute, or reduce to legal limits the whole or any part of the sentence;

"(c) the power to restore all rights, privileges, and property affected by any finding or sentence disapproved or vacated;

"(d) the power to order the sentence to be carried into execution;

"(e) the power to remand the case for a rehearing under the provisions of article 64."

On page 167, beginning with line 8, strike out all down to and including line 19, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

On page 166, strike out line 12 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"ART. 72. Suspension; vacation of suspension."

On page 166, before line 13, insert the following:

"(a) The power to order the execution of a sentence of a court-martial shall include the power to suspend the whole or any part thereof, except that a death sentence may not be suspended. The authority which suspends the execution of a sentence may restore the person under sentence to duty during such suspension; and the death or honorable discharge of a person under a suspended sentence shall operate as a complete remission of any unexecuted or unremitted part of such sentence."

On page 166, at the beginning of line 13, strike out "(a)" and insert in lieu thereof "(b)."

On page 166, at the beginning of line 20, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)."

On page 166, in line 25, strike out "article 71 (c)" and insert in lieu thereof "subsection (e) of this article."

On page 167, at the beginning of line 4, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)."

On page 167, after line 7, insert the following:

"(e) No order of suspension of a sentence shall be vacated unless and until confirming or appellate action on the sentence has been completed as required by articles 66 and 70.

"ART. 73. Petition for a new trial.

"At any time within one year after approval by the convening authority of a court-martial sentence which extends to death, dismissal, dishonorable or bad-conduct discharge, or confinement for one year or more the accused may petition the judge Advocate General for a new trial on grounds of newly discovered evidence or fraud on the court. If the accused's case is pending before the board of review, the judicial council or before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, the Judge Advocate General shall refer the petition to the board, council, or court, respectively, for action. Otherwise, the Judge Advocate General shall act upon the petition."

On page 169, line 13, strike out "or" and insert after "affirmed," "or confirmed."

On page 169, line 16, strike out "or" and insert after "affirmation," "or confirmation."

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

"SEC. 16. The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three additional circuit judges for the District of Columbia circuit. Accordingly, title 28, United States Code, section 44 (a), is amended to read as follows with respect to such circuit:

"'Circuits: Number of judges
District of Columbia..... Nine'"

On page 153, between lines 4 and 5, strike out numbers 66 through 72, inclusive, and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"66. Appellate review in the Office of the Judge Advocate General.
67. Branch offices.
68. Review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia
69. Advisory council on military justice.
70. Confirmation.
71. Powers incident to power to confirm.
72. Suspension; vacation of suspension."

EXPLANATION

Amendment L preserves the present system of appellate review now used in the Army and Air Force, but provides that for the sake of uniformity of interpretation and application, question of interpretation or construction may be certified to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The present system of automatic appellate review is a unique feature in the Army and Air Force system of justice which accords to every person accused of a serious offense rights which no other judicial system, civil or military, does. Perhaps it would be well to explain it at this time. Let us trace a case from its beginning until its final disposition.

An offender is apprehended and charges are prepared against him after a preliminary investigation. These charges are forwarded to his regimental commander who orders a fair and impartial investigation. At the investigation the accused has a right to be represented by counsel furnished him by the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction. He can cross-examine witnesses for the Government and introduce his own. The report and recommendations of the investigating officer and the views of the regimental commander together with the charges and the allied papers then go to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction. The latter refers the charges and all papers to the staff judge advocate for advice, whether the case warrants trial or whether the charges should be dismissed. Assume then that the charges are referred for trial and a trial is had and results in a conviction. The verbatim record must then be carefully reviewed by the staff judge advocate who prepares a review in writing for presentation to the reviewing authority. Many cases are dismissed at this and earlier stages for a multitude of reasons. If the staff judge advocate finds the record legally sufficient to support any sentence of bad-conduct discharge or worse, and the record is approved by the reviewing authority, it goes to a board of review in the Judge Advocate General's office.

If the board of review holds the record of trial bad—and the Judge Advocate General agrees, the case is ended right there.

If the board holds the record good and the Judge Advocate General agrees that it is, the reviewing authority can order the sentence into execution, except that every very serious case like a case involving a death sentence, a life sentence, dismissal of an officer or a case involving a general officer must also be confirmed. The confirming authority in cases of death sentences is the President. In other cases it is the judicial council consisting of three general officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps acting together with the Judge Advocate General.

Now let us suppose the Board of Review holds a case good, and the Judge Advocate General disagrees. He then refers the case to the Judicial Council, even though it is not one of the serious cases which goes to the Council automatically. If the Judicial Council and the Judge Advocate General are in disagreement then the question is resolved by the Secretary of the Department.

Now all these agents are independent judicial bodies removed from command influence. The Board of Review and the Council have minds of their own and if you take the trouble to examine the various volumes of reports in which the opinions of the Board of Review are collected, you will find no evidence of command influence over their actions.

This system of checks and balances, except for the Judicial Council, was the capstone of military justice during World War II. Now there has been a lot of criticism of the system of military justice, mostly about excessive sentences and command influence at the lower levels. There has been no criticism of the system of appellate review. It is this system, which evoked a grudging tribute from the critical Vanderbilt committee. That committee reported:

"The Army system of justice in general and as written in the books is a good one; * * * it is excellent in theory and designed to secure swift and sure justice; * * * the innocent are almost never convicted and the guilty are seldom acquitted."

The committee found some faults and made certain recommendations, most of which were enacted into law last year. The abuses dealing with excessive sentences and command influence have been corrected in the Kem amendments and in the new manual for courts martial.

Unfortunately the bill now before you chips away and whittles away some of the rights for which the Senator from Missouri fought so valiantly last year. Its worst overall feature is that it destroys the checks and balances which insure justice to the accused and to the Government.

Now to emphasize the point, it is to be borne in mind that under the Kem amendment and under the bill before us, the appellate agencies in the Judge Advocate General's office have extraordinary powers which are rarely exercised by appellate courts. They have the power to weigh the evidence, judge the credibility of witnesses and determine controversial facts.

Instead of a system of checks and balances, the uniform code before you makes the Board of Review the final and only appellate agency to consider questions of fact. Under article 66 (c) it is given absolute discretion to approve any such findings or sentences or parts of sentences only what it determines should be approved. If it acts on the facts, or on policy or anything other than law, its determination is final and conclusive. Neither the Judge Advocate General nor the accused can appeal any question other than one of law to the Court of Military Appeals. Of course, the accused can always petition for a review, but under article 67 (d) the Court of Military Appeals would be precluded from considering it.

Now there goes your system of checks and balances—all up in smoke, predicated upon a notion that a copy of our usual civilian system of appeals is better. And there goes the unique feature of automatic appellate review, because now the person who secures a dismissal or a life sentence must perfect an appeal, probably hire a lawyer, and petition the Court of Military Appeals for a review in the hope that the clerk who considers his petition will grant him one, whereas under the Kem amendment he is guaranteed automatic consideration by the board of review, by the judicial council, and by the Judge Advocate General in every case.

I urge you not to make this retrograde step. Leave the appellate system as it is in the Army and Air Force and give it also to the Navy. Then you will have uniformity. Now to insure uniformity of interpretation, let the Judge Advocate General, or the Secretary, or the President certify particular cases in which there may be conflicting views or one requiring interpretation of the statutes to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Those are essentially the recommendations of General Green, except that he would prefer to set up a court of appeals consisting of the three Judge Advocate Generals and the general counsel of the Treasury. There is a great deal of merit in his proposal, but the drive of civilian review is so great that I feel there must be some merit in it too. Rather than set up another specialized court, I would rather see those cases go to a United States court in whom all concerned can have confidence—not into one which must, by statute, be constituted on the basis of political consideration. I have never before heard a proposal like that contained in article 67 (a) (1) that "not more than two of the judges of such court shall be appointed from the same political party." Political considerations, one way or the other, have no place in the appointment of a judicial body for the armed forces.

Although my amendments do not follow altogether General Green's views, I would like the Senate to hear the views of the one man in the Government who has had the most widespread and over-all experience with a military system of appellate review.

"4. Powers of the Board of Review.

"Article 66 (c) provides in part that the Board of Review 'shall affirm only such findings of guilty, and the sentence or such part or amount of the sentence, as it finds correct in law and fact and determines, on the basis of the entire record, should be approved.'

"Under articles 66 and 67 the determination of the Board of Review is final as to any matter other than a question of law. The latter is subject to appeal to the Civilian Court of Military Appeals either by the Judge Advocate General or the accused. This in effect authorizes the Board to disapprove or mitigate legal sentences which have been approved by responsible senior commanders. It authorizes them to consider other than legal matters in determining what part of a finding or the sentences, should be approved. For example, a board may consider that a given order which an accused is charged with having violated is unwise, and that therefore, on the basis of the entire record, a finding should be disapproved. This makes possible an unwarranted invasion of the command prerogative and would authorize the Board of Review to substitute its judgment on military policy for that of the commander in the field. This determination under the proposed bill would be absolutely final. I could not appeal that case to the Court of Military Appeals because the Board's determination would not be based on a question of law.

"Under the present case load in my office I have six boards of review. I may soon need more. Under the proposed bill I would need even more. The members are bright, well qualified, and conscientious military lawyers. They have experience both as soldiers and as lawyers. Many of them are relatively young. They function well in determining legal sufficiency of records and in weighing evidence. They have not all, however, attained the wisdom in matters of policy which comes with experience and age nor have they all attained the instinctive familiarity with military matters which comes with many years of experience with troops. The powers which article 66 gives them have heretofore been exercised by the confirming authority, i. e., the President, the Secretary or the Judicial Council, and the Judge Advocate General—all of whom have far greater responsibility with respect to the accomplishment of the military mission than do the boards of review. I believe it unwise to entrust such sweeping powers to such relatively younger officers or civilian employees (as authorized by the code). I must use younger officers on these boards—because I can't concentrate all my older and wiser heads in Washington. Some of them are needed in the overseas theaters and other commands where difficult military legal problems arise. And even in Washington I have to use senior officers to head my claims, military affairs, contracts, procurement, and patent divisions. Under the proposed article 70 I would have to provide an undetermined number of my ablest appellate officers as appellate government and defense counsel to represent the Government and the accused before boards of review and before the Court of Military Appeals. In spite of the fact that the proposed bill will increase somewhat the number of cases to be examined by a board of review, the Judge Advocate General will have to reduce the number of boards because of the especially high qualifications these extended powers will demand and because the increased demand for the services of my most qualified officers to fill other positions. This too will delay the disposition of cases.

"The bill proposed by Professor Morgan's committee had a remedy for this provision—it authorized the Judge Advocate General to refer a case to another board of review if he was dissatisfied with its holding. This was somewhat unjudicial and the House committee struck it out—wisely, I think. It did, however, point out the extremely critical problem. Some judicial remedy should be provided. I urge you to leave the power to commute and consider nonlegal matters with a confirming authority and to authorize the Judge Advocate General to dissent with the board and refer any case to a higher confirming authority or a Military Court of Military Appeals. This brings me to my final major point of disagreement.

"5. Civilian Court of Military Appeals.

"At the outset I would like to state that I am in accord with the underlying principle of article 67g which provides for a continuing study of military justice, matters to be conducted by a body of eminent jurists in conjunction with the Judge Advocate Generals of the services and annual report to the responsible Secretaries and the Congress. The remarkable accomplishment of the Vanderbilt committee clearly demonstrates the usefulness of such a study. It provides helpful liaison with the legal profession. It would ultimately lead to further perfection of the system of military justice.

"But with respect to a wholly Civilian Court of Military Appeals I cannot agree. Military justice is a field of the law which requires not only a thorough familiarity with criminal law—but also experience and training in military matters. You would not entrust a complicated patent problem to a tax lawyer who was not thoroughly familiar with the engineering or other technical matters involved no matter how good a tax lawyer he might be. The capstone of the system of military justice should consist of those military lawyers who are most highly experienced and trained both from a military and a judicial viewpoint; both as soldiers and as judges. The legal services of the Army, Navy, and Air Force have produced such judges and are ideally organized to produce more such judges. This requirement can't be met merely by providing that the Civilian Court of Military Appeals will consider only questions of law. Every lawyer knows that questions of fact and questions of law cannot be separated in airtight compartments. Military law in itself embodies hundreds of complicated problems of status arising out of customs of the service as well as statute and regulation.

"In the files of my office there is a case of a corps artillery group commander who was tried for the willful disobedience, before the enemy, of a division commander's orders to go into a particular position with his battalions and stay there. In the heat of the battle his group left that position. He contended that he was going to an alternate position from which he could more effectively accomplish his mission. Among the issues in the case was the question of whether he was attached to the division or merely supporting it. This involved both a question of fact and of military law. If he was merely supporting the division, to what extent did the division commander have authority to order him to stay in a position which he considered poor; if he was attached, to what extent did the group commander have discretion in exigent circumstances to leave a position given him by the division to go to another one of his own choosing?

"These are all problems which required a thorough and detailed knowledge of tactical organization, the legal effect of a corps' standing operating procedure, and customs of the service in general. What special qualifications do civilians without extensive military experience have to determine such questions? I can cite you many such cases. For instance, is an air base several hundred miles from a target "Before the enemy"? And consider the purely military legal problem presented by Wade v. Hunter as to whether military exigency constituted imperious necessity with respect to former jeopardy. These are problems which ultimately would be resolved by the Court of Military Appeals.

"Is there a need for such a court? Has the administration of military justice broken down at the appellate level? I submit that there has been no such failure. The opinions and holdings of the boards of review since their creation in 1920 constitute one of the most comprehensive bodies of criminal reports in the United States, reports which compare favorably with those of both Federal and State appellate courts. The remarkable success of the military appellate system is attested to by the fact that, out of more than 200 habeas corpus cases arising since World War II only one accused has been released from confinement as the result of final court action on his petition. The grounds upon which the one exception was released was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States 2 weeks ago in Humphrey v. Smith. I am proud of that record.

"Under our present system the most serious cases such as those involving death sentences, life imprisonment, cases involving general officers, and cases extending to dismissal of officers go automatically to the Judicial Council created by the Kem amendment for confirming action. Other cases where either the Judge Advocate General or the Board of Review believes that confirming action should be taken in the interest of justice may also be referred to the military Judicial Council. The case load is sufficient to keep the Council busy but not enough to create a bottleneck. Under the proposed bill only death cases and cases involving general officers will go to the Court of Military Appeals automatically but each accused will have a right to petition for review by that court. I think it has been estimated that in peacetime in 85 percent of 14,000 cases, or in almost 12,000 cases, the accused will have a right to petition the Court of Military Appeals for review. I think it fair to assume that a substantial percentage of those 12,000 accused will exhaust their remedy. Although only a small percentage of those cases may result in review, the task of considering the petitions themselves will be enormous. If the Court of Military Appeals of three judges gives the consideration which each petition deserves it is self-evident that substantial and deleterious delays will occur.

"I think I have demonstrated that there is no need for further review for legal sufficiency of records after military appellate review. Under the uniform code there is unquestionably a need for uniformity of sentences and uniform interpretation. Our present system is working well in the Army, and as far as I know, in the Air Force. It can be extended, with modification perhaps, to fit the needs of the other services. It preserves to each service the control of individual cases within the service. I recommend that our system be preserved. In order to provide for uniformity of sentences and of interpretation I would suggest that there be established in the National Military Establishment a military Court of Military Appeals composed of the Judge Advocate Generals of the services. Their function, together with a civilian advisory body, should be to recommend uniform policies of punishment and improvements in the administration of military justice. To provide for uniformity of interpretation, each Judge Advocate General should be empowered to certify any case for legal determination by the entire Court of Military Appeals whenever uniform legal interpretation is required.

"The proposal I make would preserve the advantage of completely automatic appellate review for all cases of the same class—which is perhaps the most important right of an accused in the military service and which is not accorded him by civil jurisdictions. It also preserves to all appellate agencies the power to weigh evidence and determine controverted questions of fact which are powers not generally exercised by civil appellate courts and which afford to an accused person rights which no other judicial system does. It would preserve the significant reforms in the administration of military justice made since 1920. Finally, by retaining the military judicial council created by the Kem amendment it would provide a career incentive which will attract able lawyers to the military service to perform the many functions which the bill requires."

I will now explain briefly each article contained in amendment L:

Article 63. Rehearings: This has been left as proposed by the committee except for changes in terminology consistent with articles 66, 68, and 70.

Article 64. Approval of the convening authority: The only change in this article as reported is to clarify that no sentence may be executed unless approved by the convening authority. The other requirements are set forth in articles 65, 66, and 70. This was taken from 47d.

Article 65. Disposition of records after review by the convening authority: Paragraph (h) spells out the requirement that in addition to the approval by the convening authority, record of trial by special court martial which is approved include a bad conduct discharge, must also be approved by the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction and be treated in every respect like a record of trial by general court martial. I have stricken the provision for advisory review by a board of review before the convening authority acts. Since the record must go back to a board of review before the bad conduct discharge is executed after the reviewing authority approves it I can see no reason for two trips to Washington. As I see this system, the board of review will be too busy to do the job of staff judge advocates. Since there is no such provision under article 61 with respect to general courts martial such special time-wasting provision with respect to a special court-martial record seems foolish to me.

Article 66. Appellate review in the office of the Judge Advocate General: This is almost identical to article of war 50 of the Kem amendment now in force in the Army and Air Force. There has been added to the cases requiring automatic appellate review any case in which there is adjudged confinement for 1 year or more whether accompanied with a bad-conduct discharge or not.

Article 67. Branch offices: Is the same as article of war 50 (c) which provides for the establishment of branch offices with boards of review and a judicial council in a distant command. It is to be borne in mind that death sentences cannot be confirmed by the branch office but must be sent to Washington for confirming action of the President. Theater commanders no longer have confirming powers.

Article 68. Review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia: This article preserves to each service an appellate system similar to that now in effect in the Army and Air Force. In the interest of uniformity, the President, the secretary of a department, or a judge advocate general are authorized to certify any case referred to them for confirming or appellate action to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, if a question of uniformity or interpretation of the statute shall arise. The court will consider questions of law only, since other questions are fully covered by the ordinary appellate review and confirming action. It will have final authority to disapprove findings or sentences in whole or in part. If it holds any finding or sentence legally sufficient, it shall return the record to the authority who certified the case for completion of confirming or appellate action.

Article 69. Advisory Council on Military Justice: This article will provide a confirming study on the administration of military justice by a body of eminent jurists in conjunction with the Judge Advocate General such as that provided for in article 67g of the bill as reported. This is the only desirable feature of the article 67 as reported.

Article 70. Confirmation: This is substantially the same as article of war 48. It provides confirmation of the more serious sentences as follows:

1. A sentence to death involving a general or flag officer may be confirmed by the President before it can be carried into execution.

Sentences involving life imprisonment, dismissal, or reduction to the ranks of an officer, or dismissal or suspension, a cadet or midshipman will be confirmed by the Judicial Council and the Judge Advocate General. If the Judge Advocate General and the Council disagree the sentence will be confirmed by the Secretary of the Department concerned.

Other cases which either the Board of Review or the Judge Advocate General has transmitted to the Council in the interest of justice or because of a disagreement may be confirmed by the Council alone unless it is not unanimous, or unless the Judge Advocate General desires to participate in the confirming action, in which event his participation is necessary.

Article 71 lists the powers incident to the power to confirm; they include the power to approve, confirm, or disapprove the whole or any part of a finding of guilty or a sentence. It includes the power to commute sentences; restore rights, privileges, and property affected of a finding or sentence disapproved or vacated; the power to order the sentence to be carried into execution; or to remand a case for rehearing.

Article 72. Suspension, vacation of suspension: This has been clarified to show that any authority competent to order the execution of a sentence, that is the reviewing authority of the confirming authority, may suspend a sentence, or part of a sentence, except a death sentence when that authority takes his action. It also provides that the death or honorable discharge of a person under a suspended sentence operates as a complete remission of the unexecuted portion of the sentence.

Section 16—at the end of the bill—provides for the creation of three additional judges to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to take care of the additional business that court will have as a result of article 68, and to relieve the pressure of work of that court with respect to its other matters.

Amendments M to Y inclusive: The next group of amendments deals with the punitive articles. These are the articles which denounce and define offenses. This, after all, is the meat of any penal code—everything else is procedural. In spite of their enormous importance the punitive articles appear to have received the least consideration of any body which has considered the bill. It is obvious from the glaring errors which appeared in the bill when first introduced that Professor Morgan's group considered these articles very hastily. In the original proposal voluntary manslaughter was apparently not an offense. This the House committee corrected in part. We next come to the consideration given by the House committee. The records of the hearings show that the punitive articles—all 45 of them—were considered on one Saturday afternoon. There were able lawyers on that committee. They saw several of the more glaring defects and hastily corrected them. The hearings show that the representatives of the National Military Establishment were utterly confused when searching questions were directed at them with respect to the few articles considered in detail. Nevertheless, only a few hours were devoted to this important article and many a grievous error was overlooked. Now, I do not maintain that my amendment will correct every error. For all I know there are many other sleepers in these articles. I think they should be considered very carefully indeed by people who know and understand criminal law. But if you want the bill to become law in a hurry, the amendments I am proposing will correct many of the mistakes of substantive law which the bill as reported contains.

I have not proposed an amendment to article 134, the general article, because it is drawn substantially in the same words as article of war 96. The construction of the article which appears in the Manual for Courts Martial is not, however, the one cited by the committee in its reports.

That article provides:

"Though not specifically mentioned in the code, all disorders and neglect to the prejudice of good order and discipline in the armed forces, all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces, and crimes and offenses not capital, of which persons subject to this code may be guilty, shall be taken cognizance of by a general or special or summary court martial, according to the degree of the offense, and punished at the discretion of the court."

Now what are these crimes and offenses, not capital. The President's interpretation in the Manual for Courts Martial, following the ancient construction placed upon the article by the Judge Advocate General for many years stated:

"Crimes or offenses, not capital, which are referred to and made punishable by article 96 include those acts or omissions not made punishable by another article which are denounced as crimes or offenses by enactments of Congress or under the authority of Congress and made enforceable by Federal civil courts.

"State and foreign laws are not included within the crimes or offenses not capital referred to in article 96 and violations thereof may not be prosecuted as such except insofar as State law becomes Federal law of local application under title 18, United States Code, section 13. On the other hand an act which is a violation of a State law or a foreign law may constitute a disorder or neglect to the prejudice of good order and military discipline or conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the military service and so be punishable under the first or second clause of article 96."

Now the committee's report, based on erroneous information contained in the House hearings states:

"This will permit the punishment of disorders and neglects to the prejudice of good order, and military discipline in the armed forces, and all conduct of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces. It will also authorize trial by court martial for violations of State and Federal crimes which are not enumerated as offenses under the code."

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Maryland whether the committee means that State law is now included in the "crimes and offenses not capital clause" and if so, what consideration moved them to upset the ancient administrative construction? Conceivably the President did not impute to Congress an abdication to State legislatures of its constitutional power to make rules for the government of the Army and Navy?

We must bear in mind that violation of a State law is not punishable by a Federal court martial as such; it is punishable only if the act or omission is actually prejudicial to good order and discipline or if it tends to bring discredit upon the service.

AMENDMENT M

On page 177, line 3, after the word "who" insert a comma and the following: "being inferior in grade."

EXPLANATION

Article 91. Insubordinate conduct toward noncommissioned officers: My amendment makes it clear that this article deals with insubordinate conduct of a subordinate toward his superior. It was proposed to the committee by General Green. This is what he said:

"The addition of the words 'being inferior in grade' is intended to make the article consistent with its title: 'Insubordinate conduct toward noncommissioned officer.'

"Without the proposed amendment it would be possible to construe the article as follows:

"'Any warrant officer * * * who * * * willfully disobeys the lawful order of a * * * noncommissioned officer * * *; or treats with contempt or is disrespectful in language or deportment toward * * * noncommissioned officer * * * while such officer is in the execution of his office shall be punished as a court martial may direct.'

"It is not believed that the committee intended to punish under this article a warrant officer for disrespect to a corporal."

AMENDMENT N

On page 179, lines 13 and 14, strike out "except as provided by law" and insert in lieu thereof "willfully and without authority of law."

EXPLANATION

Unlawful detention of another: This, too, was proposed by General Green for the following reasons:

"The proposed amendment inserts the word 'willfully' as describing the offense denounced. It is believed that the amendment will prevent prosecution for merely technical violations of the code pertaining to apprehension, arrest, or confinement. It will require that the act be done with unlawful intent."

AMENDMENT O

On page 192, beginning with line 6, strike out all down to and including line 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Any person subject to this code who, with intent to commit a felony therein, breaks and enters, in the nighttime, the dwelling house of another, is guilty of burglary and shall be punished as a court martial may direct."

EXPLANATION

This deals with article 129, burglary.

This is one on the Senate committee for the House version was considerably more sensible.

The committee's version is:

"Any person, subject to the code who, with intent to commit an offense punishable under article 118 through 128, inclusive, breaks and enters, in the nighttime, the dwelling house of another, is guilty of burglary and shall be punished as a court martial may direct."

This limits burglary to breaking and entering at night with intent to commit one of the following, but no other, offense:

1. Murder.
2. Manslaughter.
3. Rape and carnal knowledge.
4. Larceny and wrongful appropriation.
5. Robbery.
6. Forgery (whoever heard of anyone breaking and entering with intent to forge).
7. Maiming.
8. Sodomy.
9. Arson
10. Extortion.
11. Assault.

But what about the person who breaks and enters a dwelling in the nighttime with intent to commit malicious destruction (18 U. S. C. 1363 and art. 109 of the Code). He is not guilty of burglary—even though malicious destruction is a felony under 18 United States Code 1363. See 18 United States Code 1 for a definition of a felony. There must be hundreds of other felonies not included in the restrictive definition. Then bear in mind what the restrictive definition does to murder defense in article 118. Under that article an unlawful homicide committed while perpetrating a housebreaking (example—breaking and entering a dwelling in the nighttime with intent to commit malicious destruction or breaking and entering a warehouse with intent) would under article 118 (4) and articles 119 (C) (2) as presently phrased, be guilty of involuntary manslaughter only. The law reports are full of cases to the contrary. On the other hand, the person who breaks and enters a dwelling with intent to commit forgery would be guilty of murder if an unlawful homicide occurs. I cannot follow the logic of this.

The House committee changed the Morgan group's proposal to "with intent to commit a criminal offense therein." The Senate committee went back to the Morgan proposal which, in my opinion, has little merit. I suggest we follow the common law which required only the intent to commit a felony, felony being a term which varies with the course of history and experience of mankind. The present definition is too limited in scope and unnecessarily excludes the breaking and entering a dwelling in the nighttime with intent to commit one of the many felonies (18 U. S. C. 1) not denounced in articles 118 through 128 of the Code.

AMENDMENT P

On page 180, between lines 3 and 4 insert the following:

"(1) misbehaves himself; or."

On page 180, renumber all succeeding paragraphs.

On page 180, line 22, after "ance" insert a comma and the following: "consistent with his duty and mission."

EXPLANATION

ART. 99. Misbehavior before the enemy: This amendment is one proposed by General Green in his testimony. He commented:

"The foregoing amendment adds the general provision contained in article of war 75 'who * * * misbehaves himself.' (1) This term has long been construed as making culpable under the article any conduct by an officer, or a soldier not conformable to the standard of behaviors before the enemy set by the custom of our arms. It has been used to punish flagrant misconduct before the enemy not specifically denounced elsewhere in the same article. In view of its long established construction I recommended its retention in the code.

"Section (10) has been amended to make it clear that it is not intended to compel a soldier or commander to abandon a mission of paramount inportance in order to render relief to troops, etc., who may be in distress. For example, it is standard instruction to infantrymen that they must continue to advance during an attack without stopping to render aid to the wounded. Such functions are left to medical aid men."

AMENDMENT Q

ART. 118. Murder.

Any person subject to this code who unlawfully kills a human being with malice aforethought is guilty of murder and shall suffer such punishment as a court martial may direct, except that if found guilty of premeditated murder he shall suffer death or imprisonment for life as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Murder: The article attempts to define murder, but departs both from the common law definition and from that of 18 United States Code 1111.

As defined in MCM, 1949, and in 18 United States Code 1111:

"Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought."

The definition of the proposed article retains the requirement that the killing be unlawful by prescribing that it must be without justification or excuse, although the usual construction of "unlawful" is without legal justification or excuse. In lieu of the requirement that it be accompanied by malice aforethought, the article prescribes, in the alternative, four states of mind or intents:

1. A premeditated design to kill; or
2. An intent to kill or inflict great bodily harm; or
3. Engaging in an act which is inherently dangerous to others and evinces a wanton disregard of human life; or
4. Engaging in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of burglary, sodomy, rape, robbery, aggravated arson.

The first alternative sufficiently supplies the necessary element for premeditated murder for which the mandatory punishment is death or life imprisonment. The other three supply some, but not all, of the instances which have in the past been deemed sufficient to show malice aforethought. For example, there is omitted "intent to oppose force to an officer or other person lawfully engaged in arresting, keeping in custody, or imprisoning any person, dispersing an unlawful assembly, suppressing a riot or affray, or otherwise keeping the peace, provided the offender has noted that the person killed is such officer or other person employed."

Intent to commit a felony inherently dangerous to life has been traditionally regarded as proof of malice aforethought. This article limits the felonies which might be considered as involving malice to the ones specified. The selection is not particularly logical. An unintentional killing in the perpetration of a housebreaking would be involuntary manslaughter, whereas such a killing in the perpetration of a burglary would be murder. Considering that the distinction between burglary and housebreaking might be only as to whether the unlawful entry was effected a few minutes before or after sunset, the danger of overly close definition in a punitive statute becomes readily apparent.

My proposed amendment is the Federal definition of murder as defined in 18 United States Code 1111.

AMENDMENT R

ART. 119. Manslaughter.

(a) Any person subject to this code who unlawfully kills a human being in the commission of an intentional act inherently dangerous to life, done in the heat of sudden passion brought about by adequate provocation or in good faith upon, but in manifest excess of, the authority of law or apparently lawful superior order, is guilty of voluntary manslaughter and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

(b) Any person subject to this code who unintentionally kills a human being in the commission of a culpably negligent act or in the commission of an act wrongful in itself but not inherently dangerous to life is guilty of involuntary manslaughter and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Article 19. Manslaughter: The present article as reported is a distinct improvement over that initially proposed by the National Military Establishments in that it at least defines voluntary manslaughter. General Green, however, proposed some changes in the improved version, as follows:

"As to voluntary manslaughter, the proposed amendment to article 119 does away with the necessity for definition of the phrases 'intent to kill' appearing in the article as presently drawn. It will be noticed that the proposed definition of voluntary manslaughter follows that set forth in paragraph 180a, MCM 1949. Voluntary manslaughter is homicide which would be murder were not the malice aforethought ordinarily implied from the doing of an act likely to result in death excusable because of adequate provocation (Commonwealth v. Webster (5 Cush (Mass.) 295)).

"The proposed definition of involuntary manslaughter has also been taken from paragraph 180a, MCM 1949 and is considered to be a most modern and complete definition of that crime. See Lee v. United States (112 F. 2d 46, and 40 C. J. S. p. 868 (and cases there cited)), to the effect that homicide unintentionally committed in the perpetration of an act not inherently dangerous to life, though the act be a felony, is not murder but at most involuntary manslaughter. The act must, of course, be wrongful in itself (malum in se). It is thought that the requirement in the article as presently written that the act be one 'directly affecting the person' is misleading and perhaps too restrictive."

I think it would be well also to incorporate into the definition of voluntary manslaughter one recognized by the courts but which is seldom found in statutes—namely, the killing in good faith by use of excessive force by a soldier or a military policeman in manifest excess of the authority of law or apparently lawful superior order. Such a case might arise where a guard shoots an escaping prisoner whom he should have been able to recapture without such force.

AMENDMENT S

ART. 121. Larceny and wrongful appropriation.

Any person subject to this code who, knowingly and with intent to deprive the true owner permanently of his proprietary interest, wrongfully appropriates personal property to the use of a person other than the true owner without such owner's consent, or with his consent obtained by false pretense, steals such property and is guilty of larceny, and shall be punished as a court-martial may direct; but if the appropriation is committed with intent to deprive the true owner only temporarily of his proprietary interest, he is guilty of wrongful appropriation and shall be punished as a court martial may direct. Whether the property initially came lawfully or unlawfully into the hands of the person appropriating it shall be immaterial with respect to these offenses.

EXPLANATION

Larceny: This is a slight improvement over that passed by the House in that it does not brand as a thief the person who appropriates property without to deprive the owner permanently of his property. However, as long as it seems to be the trend of modern legislators to abolish the distinction between larceny, embezzlement, and other forms of theft, I do not see why we burden this article with the manner in which the thief initially gets his hands on the stolen property. Why do we bother with trespass, withholding, or obtaining, the beginnings of a wrongful appropriation. Let us concern ourselves with the end result.

1. If all forms of theft are to be combined in one definition, it would seem completely unnecessary to inquire whether the thief initially came by the property as a result of taking (common law larceny), withholding (presumably embezzlement), or obtaining (presumably obtaining by false pretense). It should be sufficient if, whatever the original means of acquisition, he thereafter, with the requisite intent, wrongfully appropriated it to the use of one other than the true owner without such owner's consent, or with his consent if obtained by false pretense. This point is tacitly admitted in the new subsection (2).

2. Throughout the definition there is an indication that one may commit larceny by taking, etc., from the possession of the true owner (the person who has the immediate and exclusive right to possession) or of any other person, even though there is no intent to deprive the true owner and even though the true owner consents. Thus, one who wrongfully took property from a thief with intent to return it to the true owner would, under this definition, be guilty of larceny. Such a person might be guilty of an incidental breach of the peace, but he certainly should not be held guilty of larceny. Of course, with respect to pleading, any person with a possessory (special) interest may be alleged to be an owner, even though he be a thief himself. But this is simply a matter of pleading, the purpose of which is merely to identify the property stolen, which matter should properly be treated in the manual and should have no place in the definition of the substantive offense of larceny.

3. With respect to the element of intent in the article as presently drawn there would seem to be no real difference between an intent to deprive, an intent to defraud, and an intent to appropriate. Obviously, all are an intent to deprive. Fraud, in the sense of the crime of obtaining, is covered in my proposal by way of negativing consent when obtained by false pretense.

4. The words "article of value of any kind" following the words "personal property" indicate that disseisin and adverse possession of real property may be larceny.

There seems to be little point in the armed services in question of law of real property. In this connection, my proposed definition would cover property severed from the realty by the thief, for the reason that once the property is severed it becomes personal property and when it is then moved or otherwise made the subject of a wrongful exercise of dominion, it is "appropriated."

The amendment I am proposing is an extension of the definition of that crime in paragraph 180, Manual for Courts Martial, 1949. It includes all forms of theft; larceny, embezzlement, obtaining by false pretenses, and knowingly receiving stolen property. The word "appropriate" is well known to the military and has often been defined to comprehend various forms of wrongful use of property of another without regard the property initially came lawfully or unlawfully in the hands of the person appropriating it (article of war 99; article for the government of the Navy 19).

AMENDMENT T

ART. 122. Robbery.

Any person subject to this code who, with intent to steal, wrongfully takes personal property from the person or in the presence of another, against his will, by violence or intimidation, is guilty of robbery and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Article 122. Robbery: This article greatly increases the type of intimidation which can supply the element of intimidation in robbery.

The proposed article would make "fear of immediate or future injury to his person or property or the person or property of a relative or member of his family or of anyone in his company" sufficient intimidation to establish robbery. By failing to qualify the nature of the property contemplated, the article makes a threat to destroy some inconsequential item of personal property sufficient for intimidation in robbery.

The true test is that the intimidation, be it a threatened injury to the victim's property or that of a relative, is of sufficient gravity to warrant giving up the property demand by the assailant. My proposed amendment omits the unnecessary and dangerous part of the definition of robbery.

AMENDMENT U

ART. 123. Forgery.

Any person subject to this code who, with intent to defraud or injure another—

(1) falsely makes or alters any writing of a public or private nature, which might operate to the prejudice of another; or

(2) passes, utters, offers, issues, or transfers such a writing as true and genuine, knowing it to be so made or altered; is guilty of forgery and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Forgery: This amendment is proposed by General Green in his appearance before the committee. His comments were:

"The definition of this crime as presently set forth in article 123 is much too narrow insofar as it states that the instrument 'would, if genuine, apparently impose a legal liability on another or change his legal right or liability to his prejudice.' There is no reason for requiring that the instrument might operate to the legal, as distinguished from other, prejudice of another. False instruments which tend to impair or impede a governmental function have been held to be subjects of forgery. Head v. Hunter (141 F. 2d 449, 451). The proposed definition is taken from section 22–1401 of the Code of the District of Columbia."

AMENDMENT V

ART. 126. Arson.

Any person subject to this code who willfully and maliciously sets fire to or burns any building or structure, movable or immovable, is guilty of simple arson and shall be punished as a court martial may direct; but if the building is a dwelling or if the life of any person in the building or structure is put in jeopardy, he is guilty of aggravated arson and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Article 126. Arson. Paragraph (b) defines and denounces simple arson as the malicious burning or setting on fire the property of another except as provided in subdivision (a). Presumably the setting on fire of any personal property—no matter how insignificant in value—and no matter whether it be a shelter, a chair, or a bundle of old newspapers would constitute arson.

This article is much too broad.

My amendment deletes so much of the definition of arson as indicated that the crime may be committed by burning any kind of property. The definition I suggest follows generally that contained in 18 United States Code 81.

AMENDMENT W

ART. 127. Extortion.

Any person subject to this code who, verbally or in writing, threatens to accuse another of a crime or offense or threatens an injury to the person or property of another, with intent thereby to obtain anything of value or to compel any person to do an act against his will, is guilty of extortion and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Article 127. Extortion: In proposing this amendment, General Green commented:

"The definition of extortion as presently written in Article 127 does not set forth the type threats which the law considers of a sufficiently grave nature to warrant a conviction of extortion, and does not mention intent to make a person do an act against his will, which is generally considered to be a sufficient intent. See section 22–2305, District of Columbia Code; Massachusetts General Laws, chapter 265, section 25.

AMENDMENT X

ART. 128. Assault.

(a) Any person subject to this code who, with unlawful force or violence, attempts to do bodily harm to another or puts another in reasonable fear of immediate bodily harm is guilty of assault and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

(b) Any person subject to this code who, intentionally or through culpable negligence, unlawfully applies force to the person of another by a material agency, mediately or immediately, is guilty of assault and battery and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

(c) Any person subject to this code who commits an assault with a dangerous weapon or other instrument or force likely to produce great bodily harm, or commits an assault with specific intent to do great bodily harm, is guilty of aggravated assault and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

(d) Any person subject to this code who commits an assault with intent to commit any felony is guilty of felonious assault and shall be punished as a court martial may direct.

EXPLANATION

Article 128. Assault: The proposed definition of assault is taken from paragraph 180k, Manual for Courts Martial, 1949.

Article 125 (b) of the present draft restricts assault with intent to do bodily harm (not with a dangerous weapon) to cases where bodily harm is actually committed. There seems to be no warrant for this restriction and the proposed amendment follows 18 United States Code 113 (c).

The proposed amendment adds felonious assaults (assaults with intent to commit any felony). Such assaults are denounced in 18 United States Code 113 (a) and (b). The Morgan report states that such assaults were intentionally omitted from the code because they were actually attempts. This is thought not to be the law, for a person can assault another (for example, a watchman en route to his place of employment) with intent to commit a felony (for example, a housebreaking) without having gone far enough with respect to the intended felony to constitute an attempt to commit it.

My amendment also includes a definition of assault and battery which I believe to be an appropriate offense for inclusion in the code. The definition was taken from the Manual for Courts Martial.

AMENDMENT Y

On page 200, line 12, after the word "any", insert "nonjudicial."

EXPLANATION

Article 140. Delegation by the President: In explaining to the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives the intention of the draftsmen with respect to the article, Mr. Larkin stated:

"I think, despite the authorization the President cannot delegate judicial acts, perhaps even legislative acts. So it is effective only to the extent that it is an administrative act.

"I think they have to be studied on a case-by-case basis as they come up.

"But it was the desire of the Bureau of the Budget to provide an appropriate flexibility in the future if it appears that it is desirable for the President to delegate some of his duties under the code" (Hearings on H. R. 2498, p. 1260).

In Runkle v. United States (122 U. S. 543, 556) the Supreme Court held that the President could not delegate his judicial function. Its reason was clearly stated to be that the law under which he acted did not permit such delegation. Speaking of a court martial, the Supreme Court stated:

"To give effect to its sentence it must appear affirmatively and unequivocally that the court was legally constituted; that it had jurisdiction; that all statutory regulations governing its proceedings had been complied with. * * *

"There can be no doubt that the President, in the exercise of his Executive power under the Constitution, may act through the head of the appropriate executive department. * * *

"Here, however, the action required of the President is judicial in its character, not administrative. As Commander in Chief of the Army he has been made by law the person whose duty it is to review the proceedings of courts martial in cases of this kind."

I emphasize that the Supreme Court said by law—and not by any inherent constitutional power—but simply by statute.

"This implies that he is himself to consider the proceedings of courts martial in cases of this kind. This power he cannot delegate. * * * And this because he is the person, and the only person, to whom has been committed the important judicial power of finally determining upon an examination of the whole proceedings of a court martial, whether an officer * * * shall be dismissed * * * as punishment for an offense with which he has been charged and for which he has been tried."

Now the proponents implied that if this section were construed as applying to judicial acts of the President it would be unconstitutional. I'm not a lawyer but I do not so construe the Runkle case. To me it clearly implies that if we pass a statute authorizing the President to delegate his judicial functions—that will be the law and we cannot complain if he exercises the power by delegating to anyone he sees fit the power to approve or disapprove death sentences. Now if we don't want him to delegate his judicial function we had better say so clearly and unambiguously right in the statute. Even if the proponents were right in their construction of the effect of the law I see no reason why the Congress should enact a statute of doubtful constitutionality and wait for the Court to construe it consistently with the Constitution and with common sense.

My amendment effects what Mr. Larkin said was intended.

On page 206, between lines 12 and 13 insert the following new sections:

"JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S CORPS FOR THE NAVY

"SEC. 14. (a) There is hereby established in the United States Navy a Judge Advocate General's Corps which shall consist of one Judge Advocate General with the rank of rear admiral, one assistant with the rank of rear admiral, three other officers with the rank of rear admiral, and an active list commissioned officer strength to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, but such strength shall not be less than 1½ percent of the authorized active list commissioned officer strength of the United States Navy, and in addition warrant officers and enlisted men in such numbers as the Secretary of the Navy shall determine.

"(b) (1) Regular Navy officers shall be permanently appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Navy in the commissioned officer grades of rear admiral, captain, commander, lieutenant commander, lieutenant, and lieutenant (junior grade). The names of commissioned officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Navy below the grade of rear admiral shall be carried on the judge advocate's promotion list. The Judge Advocate's promotion list shall be established by entering thereon the names of qualified officers of the Navy who make application to transfer to such corps and whose applications are approved by the Secretary of the Navy. The names of all such officers shall be entered on such list without change in their order of precedence on the existing promotion list. The authorized numbers in each of the several grades in the Judge Advocate's promotion list shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, but the members thus authorized shall not exceed the following percentages of the total strength authorized for that list: 8 percent in the grade of captain, 14 percent in the grade of commander, 19 percent in the grade of lieutenant commander, 23 percent in the grade of lieutenant, and 36 percent in the grade of lieutenant (junior grade): Provided, That numbers may be authorized for any grade in lieu of authorization in higher grades: Provided further, That this provision shall not operate to require a reduction in permanent grade of any officer now holding a permanent appointment.

"(2) Officers whose names are carried on the Judge Advocate's promotion list of the Navy shall be promoted to the several grades as now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers generally and the authorized numbers in grades below captain on such list shall be temporarily increased from time to time in order to give effect to the promotion system now or hereafter prescribed by law for promotion-list officers.

"(3) Within the authorized strength of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Navy additional officers may be appointed by transfer of qualified officers of the Navy, or by appointment of qualified Reserve naval officers or qualified civilian graduates of accredited law schools. Those originally appointed in the Regular Navy in the Judge Advocate General's Corps shall be credited with an amount of service for the purpose of determining grade, position on promotion list, permanent-grade seniority, and eligibility for promotion as now or hereafter prescribed by law.

"(c) The Judge Advocate General of the Navy shall, in addition to such other duties as may be prescribed by law, be the legal adviser of the Secretary of the Navy and of all officers and agencies of the Department of the Navy; and all members of the Judge Advocate General's Corps shall perform their duties under the direction of the Judge Advocate General.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the Judge Advocate General, the Assistant Judge Advocate General, and flag officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Navy shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Navy who are recommended for such positions by the Secretary of the Navy. Upon the appointment of an officer to be the Judge Advocate General or Assistant Judge Advocate General with the rank of rear admiral, he shall at the same time if not then holding permanent appointment in such grade be appointed a permanent rear admiral of the Regular Navy.

"JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S CORPS FOR THE AIR FORCE

"SEC. 15. (a) There is hereby established in the Regular Air Force a Judge Advocate General's Corps which shall consist of one Judge Advocate General with the rank of major general, one assistant with the rank of major general, three officers with the rank of brigadier general, and an active list commissioned officer strength to be determined by the Secretary of the Air Force, but such strength shall not be less than 1½ percent of the authorized active list commissioned officer strength of the Regular Air Force, and in addition warrant officers and enlisted men in such numbers as the Secretary of the Air Force shall determine.

"(b) (1) Regular Air Force officers shall be permanently appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Air Force in the commissioned officer grades of major general, brigadier general, colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, captain, and first lieutenant. The names of commissioned officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Air Force below the grade of brigadier general shall be carried on the Judge Advocate's promotion list. The Judge Advocate's promotion list shall be established by entering thereon the names of qualified officers of the Air Force who make application to transfer to such corps and whose applications are approved by the Secretary of the Air Force. The names of all such officers shall be entered on such list without change in their order of precedence on the existing promotion list. The authorized numbers in each of the several grades in the Judge Advocate's promotion list shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Air Force, but the numbers thus authorized shall not exceed the following percentages of the total strength authorized for that list: Eight percent in the grade of colonel, 14 percent in the grade of lieutenant colonel, 19 percent in the grade of major, 23 percent in the grade of captain, and 36 percent in the grade of first lieutenant: Provided, That numbers may be authorized for any grade in lieu of authorization in higher grades: Provided further, That this provision shall not operate to require a reduction in permanent grade of any officer now holding permanent appointment.

"(2) Officers whose names are carried on the Judge Advocate's promotion list of the Air Force shall be promoted to the several grades as now or hereafter prescribed for promotion of promotion-list officers generally and the authorized numbers in grades below colonel on such list shall be temporarily increased from time to time in order to give effect to the promotion system now or hereafter prescribed by law for promotion-list officers.

"(3) Within the authorized strength of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Air Force additional officers may be appointed by transfer of qualified officers of the Air Force, or by appointment of qualified Reserve Air Force officers or qualified civilian graduates of accredited law schools. Those originally appointed in the Regular Air Force in the Judge Advocate General's Corps shall be credited with an amount of service for the purpose of determining grade, position on promotion list, permanent-grade seniority, and eligibility for promotion as now or hereafter prescribed by law.

"(c) The Judge Advocate General of the Air Force shall, in addition to such other duties as may be prescribed by law, be the legal adviser of the Secretary of the Air Force and of all officers and agencies of the Department of the Air Force; and all members of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Air Force shall perform their duties under the direction of the Judge Advocate General.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the Judge Advocate General, the Assistant Judge Advocate General, and general officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps of the Air Force shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among officers of the Judge Advocate General's Corps who are recommended for such positions by the Secretary of the Air Force. Upon the appointment of an officer to be the Judge Advocate General or Assistant Judge Advocate General with the rank of major general, he shall at the same time if not then holding permanent appointment in such grade be appointed a permanent major general of the Regular Air Force."

AMENDMENT Z

On page 206, line 14, strike out "14" and insert in lieu thereof "15."

On page 209, line 9, strike out "15" and insert in lieu thereof "16."

EXPLANATION

Amendment Z: This amendment creates a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps in the Air Force and in the Navy. There is considerable to be said for the proposition that the act of June 25, 1948 "To provide for the administration of military justice within the United States Air Force, and for other purposes" incorporated for the Air Force not only the Articles of War but also "all other laws now in effect relating to the Judge Advocate General's Department, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and the administration of military justice within the United States Army." Under this statute it may be argued that the provisions of the Kem amendment relating to a Judge Advocate General's Corps are applicable to the Air Force. The Air Force, however, has seen fit to pick one part of the Kem amendment and disregard others. My amendment would require each of the services to operate under this feature of the Kem amendments which the Congress saw fit to accept last year over the emphatic objection of the War Department and the Army. I think the considerations, pro and con, were aptly stated by the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives on July 22, 1947, in reporting on H. R. 2575, Eightieth Congress, which later became law as the Kem amendment:

From Report No. 1034, House of Representatives, first session, Eightieth Congress:

"Should an independent Judge Advocate General's Corps, with a separate promotion list, be established?

"The War Department opposes the establishment of a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps; however, our committee, favors such a corps. It is important to note that every organizational representative and every individual who testified before the committee except War Department witnesses, not only favored but urged the establishment of a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps with a separate promotion list.

"Under present law command has an abnormal and unjustified influence over military justice. In opposing our decision the War Department stresses the necessity for preserving proper discipline and for giving line commanders authority which is commensurate with their responsibility. We fully agree that discipline is of the utmost importance and must be preserved; however, we feel equally certain that in the administration of military justice there is a point beyond which the considerations of justice are paramount to discipline. Under present law and under this bill, as amended, command has abundant authority to enforce discipline. It refers the charges for trial, convenes the court, appoints the trial judge advocate, law member, and defense counsel who must now be qualified personnel of the Judge Advocate General's Department and, after the trial reviews the case with full authority to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence.

"We contend that command should ask for nothing more in the furtherance of discipline. At the conclusion of a trial, under the present system, the same officers who conducted the case return to the command of a line officer who has full authority over their efficiency ratings, promotion recommendations, leaves, and duty assignments. These officers, many of whom have families and have chosen the Army for a career, would be less than human if they ignored the possibilities of such influence. We contend that those who are charged with the impartial administration of military justice must have sufficient freedom of judicial determination to meet the responsibility.

"During the course of the lengthy hearings by the Legal Subcommittee, it became apparent that it was the majority desire to establish a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps with a separate promotion list. The Under Secretary of War, Hon. Kenneth C. Royall, and Lt. Gen. J. Lawton Collins requested the opportunity to be heard in opposition to such a provision. Both of these witnesses appeared before the subcommittee and ably presented the views of command officers in opposition to a Judge Advocate General's Corps. In spite of this testimony by these able and respected witnesses, the subcommittee was still of the opinion that a separate corps should be established. When the matter was brought before the full committee for final action, the Secretary of War, Hon. Robert P. Patterson, and the Chief of Staff, Hon. Dwight Eisenhower, requested that they be permitted to appear before the full committee in opposition to a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps. Even though the request was unusual and was at variance with the established procedure of the committee in its consideration of subcommittee reports, the request was granted and both the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff appeared before the committee and voiced their strenuous objections to the curtailment of the clemency power in the Office of the Secretary of War, and the establishment of a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps. As hereinbefore stated, the clemency power was restored to the Secretary of War; however, the full committee endorsed the action of the subcommittee in voting to establish a Judge Advocate General's Corps with a separate promotion list.

"The use of the term 'independent Judge Advocate General's Corps' has been rather loose and has resulted in some unfortunate and unjustified conclusions. The primary mission of every member of the armed forces of the United States is the winning of battles in wartime and the preparation to win them in peacetime. Regardless of their technical status in the armed forces, members of the Judge Advocate General's Department or Corps have that same primary mission and we do not intend that it shall be changed. Judge Advocate officers are properly members of the War Department team and while the duties of their assignments are necessarily noncombatant in nature, it seems wholly unjustified to say, as has been done, that they are less interested in the primary mission of the Army than any other member of the armed forces.

"It has been said that this is another attempt to establish special privileges for another professional group. Nothing could be further from the truth. During the entire hearings which began on April 18 and were not concluded until the latter part of June, no member of the subcommittee nor any witness who appeared before it gave the slightest intimation that he was interested in legislating for lawyers as a class. As a matter of fact, there is a shortage of qualified legal talent in the Army, and it seems inevitable that if we are to attract qualified personnel into the Judge Advocate General's Department that we must do more than has been done heretofore. The Vanderbilt committee states that approximately 25,000 lawyers applied for duty with the Judge Advocate General's Department during the war and it remains a fact that a very small percentage of these lawyers were accepted. Many lawyers preferred not to serve in the Judge Advocate General's Department because of its unusual susceptibility to 'command.' The evidence was undisputed that many line commanders declined to use such legal talent as was available to them in matters of military justice and even went so far as to reprimand those lawyers who made an honest attempt to serve the cause of justice in military trials. Even if a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps is established, the Army will have great difficulty in obtaining qualified personnel to staff such a corps. The Army will find itself in somewhat the same position as it now finds itself with respect to doctors. They are in great demand in civilian life, and it is certain that the emoluments of civil practice exceed those offered by the Army. Some inducement must be offered to retain the qualified officers now on duty and to attract qualified graduates of our law schools into the service. The present condition does neither.

"The Secretary and the Chief of Staff have criticized a separate promotion list for the Judge Advocate General's Corps, stating that it is contrary to the basic provisions of H. R. 3830, the promotion bill, which was recently passed by the Armed Services Committee and the House. It is admitted that there are humps in certain grades in the Judge Advocate General's Department; however, any objective study of this matter will reveal that the same situation exists in other branches of the service, particularly the Air Corps. It is important to note that it is not mandatory that the Secretary of War fill all grades under the promotion bill. He may do so at his discretion, and it is inconceivable that he would take any action in this respect which was not uniform throughout the other branches of the service.

"It seems apparent that 'command' considers the Judge Advocate General's Department to be composed of a nonprofessional group, whereas we are of the opinion that the Judge Advocate's Department must be a professional group, specially trained in order that it may properly perform its function. We have been reliably informed that approximately 90 percent of the field work of the Judge Advocate's Department consists of matters relating directly to military justice and that more than 50 percent of its work in Washington is of the same nature. Another considerable function consists of the investigation and adjustment of claims. It can hardly be expected that unqualified personnel can handle these assignments. If they could, this subject would not be before us today.

"The Secretary states that the creation of a separate corps of the Judge Advocate's will not decrease the load on combat officers. We think that the creation of a separate corps would inevitably result in lessening the burden on combat officers. It is an indisputable fact that throughout the war the trial judge advocates, law members, and defense counsel, in addition to officers who investigated claims, were largely drawn from officers of the line. This resulted in those officers having a dual function and the testimony before our committee made it very apparent that the added function of military justice and claims was held to be of secondary importance.

"It is difficult to determine the costs which would be incurred by the enactment of this legislation. The War Department has estimated that the enactment of H. R. 2575 would require a total of 937 officers and a comparable number of enlisted men, at a cost of $3,200,000. Since the War Department endorses this bill, it is assumed that, if enacted, adequate qualified personnel will be provided as rapidly as they become available. Our amendment proposes a corps of 750 officers, and warrant officers and enlisted men in such numbers as the Secretary of War may determine. In any event we are of the opinion that the establishment of a separate Judge Advocate General's Corps would cost no more than the enactment of the original provisions of H. R. 2575.

"We are now on the threshold either of universal military training or of the maintenance of a professional army at least five times larger than that maintained before the last war. The future Army, no matter how it may be raised, will be composed of the physically fit youth of the country. The first contact with any judicial system for the overwhelming majority of these young men will be their experience with the administration of military justice. We believe that it is our duty, so far as lies within our power, to see that the system to which they are exposed is reasonably designed to achieve justice. The system now in effect cannot guarantee the desired result.

"Except for the committee amendment relative to the establishment of a Judge Advocate General's Corps with a separate promotion list, the War Department favors the enactment of this legislation as is evidenced by the letter from the Secretary of War which is hereto attached and made a part of this report. The Armed Services Committee favors the enactment of the proposed legislation, as amended."

The reasons advanced in 1947 with respect to the Army are equally applicable today to the other services.

Amendment A is a composite of amendments B to Z in the form of a complete substitute bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Oscar M. Jonas, of Milwaukee, Wis., to be collector of internal revenue for the District of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain-elect, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast revealed Thyself as a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God, we humbly beseech Thee to teach us how to pray.

Grant that daily we may enter into an intimate communion with the God of all grace whose wisdom never errs and whose strength never fails.

Make us sensitive and responsive to the leading of Thy spirit in our high vocation of finding the way of blessedness and peace for our own beloved country and all mankind.

Inspire us with such integrity of character and conduct that we may stand before Thee and our fellow men, unafraid and unashamed.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSE

The Reverend Bernard Braskamp, D. D., Chaplain-elect, presented himself at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call, 372 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, this is Calendar Wednesday. I make a point of order against the transaction of any business except the call of the committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects to any extension of remarks or any other business except the call of the committees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCORMACK. On this particular motion a two-thirds vote is necessary, is it not?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 28, noes 138.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and one Members are present, not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 272, not voting 55, as follows:

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. SPENCE (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6743) to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, and title IV of the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6743, with Mr. TRIMBLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I object to dispensing with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding the following new section after section 5 thereof:

"SEC. 5A. No member of a Federal home loan bank shall make or purchase any loan at any time when its cash and obligations of the United States are not equal to such amount as the Home Loan Bank Board shall by regulations prescribe: Provided, That such amount shall not be less than 5 percent or more than 15 percent of the obligation of the member on withdrawable accounts or, in the case of any member insurance company, such other base as the Board may determine to be comparable. The Board is authorized in said regulations to prescribe from time to time different amounts, within the limitations hereinbefore specified, for different classes of member institutions, and for such purposes the Board is authorized to classify such members according to type of institution, size, location, rate of withdrawals, or such other basis or bases of differentiation as the Board may deem to be reasonably necessary or appropriate for effectuating the purposes hereof. Failure to comply with the provisions hereof shall constitute ground for removal from membership. This section shall be effective 6 months after the date of its enactment."

SEC. 2. Section 6 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by the addition of the following new subsection:

"(1) Within 1 year after the enactment of this amendment, each member of each Federal home loan bank shall acquire and hold and thereafter maintain its stock holding in an amount equal to at least 2 percent of the aggregate of the unpaid principal of such member's home mortgage loans, home-purchase contracts, and similar obligations, but not less than $500. Such stock in excess of the amount hereby required may be purchased from time to time by members and may be retired from time to time as heretofore. One year after the enactment of this amendment, each Federal home loan bank shall retire and pay off at par an amount of its stock held by the Secretary of the Treasury equivalent to the amount of its stock held by its members in excess of the amount required to be held by them by the first two sentences of subsection (c) of this section immediately prior to the enactment of this amendment and annually thereafter each Federal home loan bank shall retire an amount of such Government stock equivalent to 50 percent of the net increase of its stock held by members since the last previous retirement: Provided, That none of such Government capital shall at any time be retired so as to reduce the aggregate capital stock, reserves, surplus, and undivided profits of the Federal home loan banks to less than $200,000,000: Provided further, That notwithstanding any provision of this subsection, nothing in this subsection shall limit or affect the operation of subsection (g) of this section."

SEC. 3. Subsection (g) of section 11 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(g) Each Federal home loan bank shall at all times have at least an amount equal to the current deposits received from its members invested in (1) obligations of the United States, (2) deposits in banks or trust companies, (3) advances with a maturity of not to exceed 1 year which are made to members or nonmember borrowers, upon such terms and conditions as the Board may prescribe, and (4) advances with a maturity of not to exceed 1 year which are made to members or nonmember borrowers whose creditor liabilities (not including advances from the Federal home loan bank) do not exceed 5 percent of their net assets, and which may be made without the security of home mortgages or other security, upon such terms and conditions as the Board may prescribe."

SEC. 4. Section 11 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(i) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to purchase any obligations issued pursuant to this section, as heretofore, now, or hereafter in force and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, are extended to include such purchases. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine, any of the obligations acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such obligations under this subsection shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall not at any time purchase any obligations under this subsection if such purchase would increase the aggregate principal amount of his then outstanding holdings of such obligations under this subsection to an amount greater than $1,000,000,000. Each purchase of obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a return at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the making of such purchase."

"(j) Notwithstanding the provisions of the first sentence of section 202 of the Government Corporation Control Act, audits by the General Accounting Office of the financial transactions of a Federal home loan bank shall not be limited to periods during which Government capital has been invested therein. The provisions of the first sentence of subsection (d) of section 303 of the Government Corporation Control Act shall not apply to any Federal home-loan bank."

SEC. 5. Section 402 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended by the addition of the following new subsection:

"(h) After the effective date of this subsection the Corporation is authorized and directed to pay off and retire annually at par an amount of its capital stock equal to 50 percent of its net income for the fiscal year, unless the Home Loan Bank Board by resolution shall determine that a smaller amount shall be retired. Such payments shall be made promptly after the end of each fiscal year (beginning with the first fiscal year which begins after the date of enactment of this subsection) until the entire capital stock is retired. In lieu of any and all unpaid dividends, whether for any present, past, or future period, on its capital stock, all of which dividends are hereby waived, the Corporation shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury, promptly after the end of each fiscal year (beginning with the first fiscal year which begins after the date of enactment of this subsection) a return on the average amount, at par, of its capital stock outstanding during such fiscal year at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the sixth month of such fiscal year. The retirement of such capital stock shall not affect the applicability to said Corporation of the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended."

SEC. 6. Section 402 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended by the addition of the following new subsection:

"(i) The Corporation is authorized to borrow from the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to loan to the Corporation on such terms as may be fixed by the Corporation and the Secretary, such funds as in the judgment of the Home Loan Bank Board are from time to time required for insurance purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate $750,000,000 outstanding at any one time, and the Corporation hereafter shall not exercise its borrowing power under the first sentence of subsection (d) of this section for the purpose of borrowing money from any other source: Provided, That each such loan shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the making of such loan: Provided further, That nothing in this subsection shall prevent the Corporation from issuing debentures in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b) of section 405. For the purposes of this subsection the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, are hereby extended to include such loans. Any such loan shall be used by the Corporation solely in carrying out its functions with respect to such insurance. All loans and repayments under this subsection shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States."

SEC. 7. Subsection (a) of section 404 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended by striking out "one-eighth" where it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "one-twelfth."

SEC. 8. Subsection (b) of section 404 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is repealed and stricken out.

SEC. 9. Subsection (c) of section 404 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is redesignated subsection (b) and amended to read as follows:

"(b) If an insured institution has paid a premium at a rate in excess of one-twelfth of 1 percent of the total amount of the accounts of its insured members and its creditor obligations for any period of time after June 30, 1949, it shall receive a credit upon its future premiums in an amount equal to the excess premium so paid for the period beyond such date."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] is recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] for 1 hour.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it gives me sincere pleasure to say a few words in behalf of this bill. It is a highly meritorious bill and I hope its virtues will not be clouded or its passage imperiled by collateral issues. The savings and loan associations and the building and loan associations are fine American institutions. They are as American in spirit as the dome of this Capitol or the Declaration of Independence. For years they have served a most useful purpose in making this land of ours a land of home owners. Nothing brings greater strength to our Government—nothing so stabilizes our economy, as the home. If you are going to fight subversive or sinister influences, the most effective way to fight them is to see that the American people are home owners. The savings and loan associations have, to a great extent, accomplished that purpose. The district I represent is largely a land of individual home owners. I believe the savings and loan associations are more entitled to that credit than any other agency or influence. It is a fine way for a man who does not have the ready cash to buy a home. These institutions are managed by men who usually seek no profit, and often they have no salaries. They are local institutions that have a local pride and a civic interest. They are more than financial institutions, in a sense. They are social institutions. The people come in once a week to pay their dues, and sit around the table with the directors and talk over their problems. It is a safe way to build a home, too, because the building and loan associations will see that the man puts his house on the lot he owns, and see that it is surveyed. They will see that the main contractor will have paid his bills and that he has paid the subcontractors, the material men, and mechanics in order that they may have no liens upon the property.

So I say that nothing we could do to strengthen our Government and its institutions could be more effectively done than to encourage such institutions as these.

About $14,000,000,000 of the people's money is invested in homes through these institutions at the present time. The depositing members' money is loaned to those who desire to build homes. They encourage thrift and frugality, and they encourage all the virtues that accompany them—home ownership, and thrift, and the things that go with it, that make our people strong.

So I say, when you help the savings and loan associations, you are helping our Government. The savings and loan associations for a long time have been paying substantially more than the banks for insurance in the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. They have been paying one-eighth of 1 percent, while the banks have been paying one-twelfth of 1 percent for insurance to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The banks say they have a diversity of investments, which makes them strong, but the savings and loan associations have the very best of all investments, the security of a mortgage on a man's home, which involves the height of real credit and great moral responsibility. So I say that the savings and loan associations should have their premiums reduced for insurance to at least one-twelfth of 1 percent, as provided in this bill, the same as the banks now pay.

Three times we have passed a bill in this House providing for that purpose. The last bill was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency unanimously, and was passed by the House under unanimous consent and is now in the Senate. That provision is again incorporated in this bill, because once before a provision for a reduction in the premium was passed by both the Senate and the House and presented to the President, and it sustained a pocket veto.

While there was no veto message, I understand it was vetoed because no provision was made for the retirement of the stock of the Federal home-loan banks owned by the Government, and the retirement of the Government-owned stock in the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. Provision for the retirement of that stock is made in this bill, and I am confident that if this bill passes it will receive the approval of the President, and that this much-needed and deserved reduction in the premiums of the savings and loan associations will become a reality.

With the amendments in this bill we have also provided a financial system for these worthy institutions very similar to the Federal Reserve System which has been provided for the commercial banks of the United States. The Federal home-loan banks are a reservoir of liquid resources and credit for these institutions. We have provided in this bill a Government support for the Federal home-loan banks of $1,000,000,000 by which their securities can be purchased by the Treasury of the United States up to that amount, thus furnishing a liquidity to these institutions that will strengthen them in times of emergencies. There is also in the bill a provision requiring the maintenance of a certain percentage of liquidity by the savings and loan associations under the supervision of the Home Loan Bank Board. It is the same provision made in the Federal Reserve Act with reference to time deposits in the commercial banks. The Federal Reserve Act provides for a liquidity reserve on time deposits of a minimum of 3 percent and a maximum of 6 percent. This bill originally provided for the liquidity of savings and loan associations under the discretion of the Home Loan Bank Board of a 5-percent minimum and 15-percent maximum. We have reduced that requirement to 4-percent minimum and 8-percent maximum, which we believe is ample to maintain the liquidity to permit the depositor when he needs his funds to withdraw them in reasonable time. It will give a stability to these institutions which they otherwise have not had. It is true that the average liquidity of the savings and loan associations throughout the United States is now about 19 percent, but there is a wide variation in the liquidity, there is no uniformity, and under the rulings of the Federal home-loan bank a level of liquidity may be maintained for all these institutions that will permit withdrawing members to obtain their money in a reasonable time.

There is also incorporated in this bill a provision that the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation may borrow from the Treasury in time of need $750,000,000; this, together with a little over $200,000,000 which they now have, will make a backlog of $1,000,000,000 which will give them a stability they otherwise have not had, and which will have a psychological effect upon the shareholders just as the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has had upon depositors in banks.

We think that when you have passed this act you will have brought to these institutions a stability, and will have strengthened them and will have better equipped them to continue the useful services that they are now furnishing and will continue to furnish to the American people.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I have just had an opportunity to casually look this bill over and from my observation of it there seems to be a billion dollars made available to these institutions according to page 5 and $750,000,000 according to page 7, a total of $1,750,000,000.

Mr. SPENCE. It would provide Treasury support for these institutions in case of an emergency.

Mr. TABER. Are they having any trouble in taking care of legitimate demands upon them at this time?

Mr. SPENCE. It is very much analogous to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. They have a billion dollars surplus now that they can use. They also have a borrowing authority from the Treasury of $3,000,000,000 if they should use it. Maybe they will never use it. These people may never use it. But it gives a security to them, it has a psychological effect, that I think will be very beneficial.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TRIMBLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6743) to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, and title IV of the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 364 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, the legislation before the Committee this afternoon relates to certain operations of the Federal Home Loan Bank System and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. As one who has been actively identified with the building and loan business in my State for more than 25 years and is reasonably familiar with the activities of the building and loan associations, I want to say that I am wholeheartedly in support of the general objectives contained in this piece of legislation.

Those of you who were not present to hear the splendid exposition of this bill made by the chairman of the committee, who, without notes or memoranda, made one of the finest expositions of this bill that could possible be made, missed a real treat. The chairman of the committee voiced some very homely American sentiment with respect to home ownership in this country and did it in a magnificent manner. Because I was impressed by the statement of the distinguished chairman of this committee, I deemed it advantageous at this time to call his attention and the attention of the other Members of Congress to the fact that perhaps some of the administrative and executive agencies of the Government do not share his ideas as to the virtues of home ownership.

As proof of that situation I call your attention to the fact that one of the most widely read pieces of literature distributed by the Government is a publication known as Your Child From Six to Twelve, which is one of the infant-care series published by the Children's Bureau of the Federal Security Agency. It has a very wide circulation throughout the entire country. Most of you have perhaps sent that pamphlet out to your constituents, but I doubt if very many Members of Congress have taken it upon themselves to read it meticulously to see what is in it. I confess that up to a short time ago I fell in that category myself. But I read this thing last fall carefully and I was simply amazed at the subtle propaganda contained in this document that finds its way into most of the family homes of America.

Let me call your attention to just one paragraph in this pamphlet which relates directly to the speech made by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency this afternoon. The writer starts out with the statement:

> Each kind of society builds a whole set of rules that are considered important enough to be taught children at their mother's knee. Many of these ways of life are second nature to us. Children grasp and follow most of them without any special training. We are not always conscious of our role as interpreters of what is good in our way of life and what is worth passing on. If certain practices are accepted in our community we assume sometimes without judging or weighing them that they are a full part of our culture. We drive on the right-hand side of the road without stopping to think whether there is any good reason for it. Many people set their hearts on owning a home, although home owning has ceased to be the sign of a stable family that it once was. There is a lot to be said for the heritage of a family, a region or a country's traditions that grew up long ago were reasonably original, but when we cling to them long after conditions have changed, they may hinder further progress and adjustment.

Then without quoting further, may I say that this book which is here for everybody to read, contains a long statement indicating that due to the progress of this country, the old idea of home ownership is a relic of the horse-and-buggy days and that we must now look forward to Government homes, Government ownership, Government sponsorship in the home-owning field all over this country instead of clinging tenaciously to this element of our life that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency said was characteristic of America as the Declaration of Independence through the operation of building and loan associations throughout this country that are dedicated to protecting, preserving, and expanding individual home ownership as against the idea of collectivism in the ownership of homes through ownership by the Government itself.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Does the gentleman think, in order to encourage home ownership, that they ought to be exempt from taxation?

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I do not care, may I say to the gentleman, to get into any academic or other discussion of that particular subject. That is related to another feature.

The thing I am trying to do is to call attention to this: Here we have had a most splendid exposition of home ownership from the chairman of this great committee, and yet there is going out and has gone out all over this country subtle propaganda of the character I have indicated that is intended to destroy the traditional idea of home ownership that the chairman of the committee so beautifully and artfully described in his discussion here this afternoon.

May I say to you that this thing, along with a lot of other things that appear in that pamphlet, did not escape the notice of the subcommittee of which I happen to be a member. A hearing was held, from which I have quoted in part, in which these matters were brought to the attention of the head of the Federal Security Agency and the head of the Children's Bureau, and if I were to go on and quote many of the other items of propaganda that appear in that pamphlet you would be just as shocked as I am sure they were when it was called to their attention. In fact, Mr. Ewing, the Federal Security Administrator, I am sure, was distinctly shocked to find in the publication sent throughout the country over his signature statements of policy that he disapproved of. We were advised yesterday that that booklet is now, by reason of the action of the subcommittee in calling it to their attention, being completely revised, and that new publications that are sent out perhaps will not contain such offensive material as has been contained in that publication in the past.

I am calling your attention to the fact that we are working at cross purposes, when one ideology is stressed in connection with this legislation so splendidly by the chairman of the committee, only to find his feet cut out from under him, if you please, by propaganda that is emanating from an executive agency of the Government. I want to say that I wholeheartedly concur in the statement made by the chairman of the committee as to the purposes of this bill, and I hope that it will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the President's decision yesterday to set into motion the development of the hydrogen bomb—a decision to which there seems little alternative—has placed us on a knife edge of history. With almost equal ease, we could fall either into mass destruction, or into a condition of active peace, instead of our present condition of inactive war.

In my opinion, it is not enough merely to decide whether or not to go ahead with the production of the bomb. We must also decide what the bomb means, and what we intend to do with it. We must make it unmistakably clear to the world, with more than a sentence or two of lip service, that we recognize fully the responsibility we have assumed, and that we intend to use this new creation in whatever way we can to bring about a firmer peace.

We are about to bring about an immense advance in the awful science of human destruction through the marshalling of all our scientific know-how. Our job now is to marshal all the statesmanship at our command. We must devise the political advances necessary to keep pace with science and to protect mankind from this and other destructive weapons.

After using the atomic bomb in order to hasten the end of World War II and bring peace, this Nation undertook a careful examination of its responsibilities to the world arising out of its possession of the bomb. Two committees were established, headed respectively by Secretary Acheson and David Lilienthal, and made up of scientists and statesmen of the highest stature. They were directed to bring together scientific and political facts in appraising the effect of our new weapon upon the world. Many of these men actually participated in the creation of that weapon; men such as Dr. Conant, Dr. Oppenheimer, and General Groves.

The Baruch plan conveyed our responsibilities to the world. It was a plan to make the atomic bomb the controllable possession of all nations together. It was not a political plan. It was based on hard scientific facts that could not be compromised if effective international control was to be achieved.

I firmly believe that our obligations have not been changed in the slightest by our decision to develop the hydrogen bomb. If anything, they have increased.

In my opinion, we can make it most clear to the world that our faith is good and our intentions peaceful by announcing that we are still prepared to submit, along with all other nations, to the scientific conditions necessary to effective international control of the hydrogen bomb. We must make it clear that our offer is at all times open to any nation willing to face the scientific facts. That is our minimum responsibility to the world. But is that the end of our responsibility?

The hydrogen bomb is a destructive force of new proportions—as new as were the proportions of the atomic bomb when it was first exposed. In my opinion, if we are to know clearly what our obligations to the world consist of, we must appraise as quickly as possible, but with the same care used in studying the atomic bomb in 1946, the effect this weapon might have upon us and other nations. I hope that scientists and statesmen of the highest stature will once more be brought together for that very purpose.

The very existence of such a tremendous destructive force suggests that these men will have to consider a very different world from that in which we have always lived. For example, in the Atlantic Pact nations of the Western World have seen fit to vest a certain measure of their sovereignty in a common defense organization. It seems to me highly probable that the immensely greater destructive force of the hydrogen bomb will dictate that all nations vest even a greater degree of their freedom of decision in an international government.

As a further example; the atomic bomb has succeeded in preventing the outbreak of a hot war, but has left the world living in armed camps. If the camps should come to possess hydrogen bombs, even this condition of an armed truce might well become intolerable. What should be our course of action if a part of the world should fail to accept participation in a scheme of international control of hydrogen energy? That may well be the No. 1 question confronting our scientists and statesmen in the hydrogen age.

I sincerely hope that our preoccupation with the threat of military aggression or with the superiority of the hydrogen bomb will not allow the free world to lose sight of that other imminent threat: social aggression. We have learned all too clearly that communism does not rely on military aggression for its growth: it feeds on human misery and discontent. I hope that the free world, with the United States at its head, will not cease to do everything within its power to eradicate those conditions.

It has been said that no nation has a right to assume the responsibilities associated with such a destructive weapon. But as long as the knowledge for making this bomb is available to man, these responsibilities must one day fall to one nation or another. The President has chosen to have them fall upon a government responsible to its people, with a tradition and a deep-seated aversion to war or violence as a means of settling issues. He chose this rather than leaving open the possibility that the responsibilities might fall to a nation ruled by 13 men accountable to no one but themselves.

As we assume the tremendous responsibility of this new undertaking, we must so conduct ourselves as to leave no doubt that we are actuated by high moral and ethical principles. The peoples of the world will be judging us by these high standards.

We are now faced with the greatest test to which democratic government has ever been put. This may be the last opportunity the statesmen will have to catch up with the scientists. This may be our last chance to avoid a third world war.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield to my good friend from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I compliment the gentleman from Washington on making the statement he has just made in relation to the President's order to go ahead with the construction of the hydrogen bomb. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If he is not in a position to answer it, of course he will not do so. Can the gentleman give the Members of the House any idea as to just how much more destructive the hydrogen bomb is than the atomic bomb?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I will answer in this way: The proposed hydrogen bomb is analogous to the development from TNT to the A-bomb. Any nation which gets a stock pile of these bombs will have the means by which human life in the great cities of the world can well be disposed of in a very short time. I think that is what we should bear in mind as we move into this new undertaking. I only hope that our people both at home and abroad will try to learn to live as world citizens must live if mankind is to survive.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I am pleased to yield to my friend from Arkansas.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. I wish to add to the statement of the gentleman from Montana my own commendation for the very excellent statement the gentleman from Washington has made. It seems to me that the emphasis is rightly placed by the gentleman upon the moral elements which this situation presents. I had the pleasure of hearing the gentleman from Washington present his views to the Committee on Foreign Affairs when that committee held hearings on House Concurrent Resolution 64 which as I understand it embodies the basic ideas which the gentleman has expressed today, the idea that would lead us to a world made secure by a system of law and order based upon the principles of justice and administered by international tribunals which recognize and apply those principles. I think in a situation like this in which some sense of terror and some fears have grown out of the announcement it is well for the voice of an influential Member of the Congress to be raised in behalf of those principles. I am sure the Members of the House have heard the gentleman with great interest and with great appreciation of this emphasis.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for his kind remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman from Wisconsin make a statement with respect to a Government bulletin issued by the executive department in which it was disclosed that the author of the bulletin did not believe in home ownership. The pamphlet stated that home ownership was relegated to the horse-and-buggy days. It recalled that I have the privilege of being a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency to study the question of housing in Europe.

While in London we talked with the Ministry of Health, with the London County Council on housing, and other important officials with respect to the attitude of the English in connection with housing.

I had had the idea that to an Englishman his home was his castle. I had felt that the homes of the English were the bastions of freedom.

We were told, however, by the Socialist officials that the people of England were not now interested in owning their homes; that the people of England wanted to be mobile, in order that they might move at will from one part of their tightly packed island to another; that the people of England were interested only in renting houses, and that those houses should be owned by the Government. We were told that in England today not a single house could be built by a private individual or a private corporation. All houses, all homes, all buildings in which people are housed, are now built, constructed and owned by the Central Government or by the municipal government. I do not believe the people of England have changed. They seem just as interested in their houses as before the advent of the Socialist government. How long they will retain their attitude will depend upon their resistance to the propaganda fed to them by the planners.

A great general has stated that our danger today is not a revolution by force and violence. Our great danger today is a revolution of ideas, and it will come upon us quietly.

So I compliment the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] for finding this pamphlet prepared by the executive department. It contains the incubation of germs of a creeping paralysis stifling the idea of home ownership.

In connection, Mr. Chairman, with this particular bill, when it was considered by the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] asked that there be included in the record of the hearings a statement concerning the trend of home ownership in this country since 1890. On page 29 of the hearings you will find an interesting table. Beginning with 1890 the non-farm-home ownership in this country amounted to 36.9 percent. In 1947 the non-farm-home ownership had risen to 52.6 percent. To me this was indeed gratifying, that the people of this country, at least, believe that in home ownership the people will find liberty and freedom. They will continue to believe it unless they are subjected to propaganda from evil sources.

So this bill brought before the committee today is an effort to retain home ownership, is an effort to retain the construction and building of homes under our system of free enterprise.

So it is highly important that we examine the bill to determine what it provides, particularly if it is presented to increase or enhance the authority of the Executive we must examine it critically to determine whether or not it will tend to take from the people our traditional idea of home ownership and freedom.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 30]

Bailey	Burdick	Dawson
Baring	Burke	D'Ewart
Bennett, Mich.	Byrne, N. Y.	Dondero
Biemiller	Canfield	Engel, Mich.
Bland	Celler	Engle, Calif.
Bolling	Chatham	Fellows
Bosone	Chesney	Fisher
Brehm	Christopher	Gary
Brown, Ga.	Coudert	Gilmer
Buckley, Ill.	Crook	Gore
Bulwinkle	Curtis	Granger

Hébert	Monroney	Shafer

Lesinski	Potter	Wadsworth
McDonough	Rabaut	Walsh
Macy	Ramsay	Whitaker
Martin, Mass.	Rich	White, Idaho
Meyer	Sabath	Whitten
Miller, Md.	Sadowski	Woodruff

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TRIMBLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6743, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 357 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COLE] has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this bill reminds me of a Chinese dish, called sweet and sour. It has some sweet things in it and it has some things which to me are very sour. One of the sweet things was passed by this House three times. That was a reduction of the insurance premium paid by associations for insurance of their accounts. It reduced the insurance premium from one-eighth of 1 percent on those accounts insured to one-twelfth of 1 percent.

The executive department in control of this legislation—and I say "control" advisedly—incorporated that sweet thing in this bill with other sections not so palatable. One of those sections provides for a statutory liquidity provision. The statutory liquidity provision has been hotly contested and hotly debated by the people in the industry for many years, and now the provision is presented to the House. Its sour taste is sweetened by the proposal to reduce premiums. It provides that by statute the building and loan associations shall maintain a liquid position equal to from 4 to 8 percent of the member's obligation on withdrawal accounts. Heretofore the associations have maintained their liquid positions according to the discretion of their boards of directors, under State and Federal supervision.

The savings and loan associations over the entire Nation now hold in cash and Government bonds, as of December 31, 1948, 19 percent of their total private withdrawable capital. In addition, each association has a very important secondary liquidity in the form of unused credit at its Federal home-loan bank. By regulation these banks restrict advances to their member institutions, so that they will have an unused credit equal to at least 50 percent of their total borrowing capacity.

The actual borrowing capacity of the member savings and loan associations now exceeds 90 percent of the total borrowing capacity. This is 43 percent of their total withdrawal capacity. So, Mr. Chairman, today the savings and loan associations are maintaining liquid positions far in excess of the statutory requirements provided for in this bill. Many of the managers of the associations and many of the people expert in the knowledge of the workings of these associations feel that a statutory requirement of liquidity is not good. They say the reason is, first, that a statutory requirement may eventually become the maximum requirement. Managers may reduce their liquid assets in the association down to that provided in the statute.

In addition, while this bill provides for a reasonably low liquidity, it is the beginning of a new concept of Federal control. For the first time, the Congress is substituting its judgment for that of the board of directors of the institution. If this provision is adopted, it is an entering wedge to permit some future Congress to raise the requirements to such an extent that many sound institutions would be seriously handicapped.

The liquidity of a given institution is a matter of sound discretion and cannot be subjected to inflexible statutory regulation.

The associations are all under close supervision by Federal and State authorities. These supervisory authorities may, at any time, criticize and force a revision of the liquidity of any given association.

This so-called floor is, therefore, entirely unnecessary.

Thus, by Government control these institutions will be brought under a freezing process and may not be able to operate in the freedom of private enterprise.

Mr. Chairman, in order to obtain a favorable vote upon this bill providing for a rigid statutory liquid requirement there has been provided a sweet part, this being the reduction of the insurance premium. In addition another sweet morsel has been added known as the backstop provision.

The so-called backstop section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase obligations of the Federal Home Loan Bank System in an amount not greater than $1,000,000,000.

In addition, the Treasury is authorized to lend to the Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation up to $750,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Many saving associations would like to have this reserve upon which to draw in time of need. At the present, however, it is probably only a psychological benefit. If we face a great depression some such provision may be required, but it is now dangled as bait to secure support for the statutory liquidity requirement.

It is true that similar provisions are found in the banking law. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has the same Federal support, so it may be proper that these particular things be done if we set up a statutory requirement for liquidity. But, Mr. Chairman, my complaint is that we find the Federal Government coming in and saying to these associations: "If you want a reduction of your insurance premiums, you must thus go along with us on these other provisions."

Mr. Chairman, I find myself in disagreement with some of the provisions of this bill. I therefore do not believe I can support it. I hope you will consider this bill carefully before you pass it; I hope you will examine it from the points of view that I discussed in my opening statement. That you examine it to determine whether it furthers the regimentation of business by government. I am quite sure there is that possibility.

Each of us who is interested in the continuation of home ownership and private enterprise in this country must realize that the creeping paralysis of socialism does not necessarily come by a quick overturn of government but may likewise come by piecemeal acquisition of power and control by the Government.

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr COLE of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. REES. Does the gentleman think it may be possible to amend this bill so as to comply with the suggestions, especially with respect to the question of reducing the insurance? The gentleman agrees with me, I believe, that we could reduce the insurance.

Mr. COLE of Kansas. That we can do and should.

Mr. REES. Could we not amend this bill by striking out these provisions to which the gentleman disagrees and then pass the legislation?

Mr. COLE of Kansas. I think the gentleman and I will each have an opportunity and will do the best we can along that line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I hope every Member of the House will read the article in the Washington Post this morning reporting on Secretary of Agriculture Brannan's request of a congressional committee for guidance in disposing of the present potato surplus.

It seems to me to be altogether fitting and proper, Mr. Speaker, that Secretary Brannan should ask the Congress for guidance in disposing of these surplus potatoes, for the simple reason that Mr. Brannan almost got down on his knees and begged this Congress to change the present law which forces the Secretary to buy up potatoes so that they are subject to rotting. This ridiculous situation of potatoes rotting in storage is clearly the fault of the Republican- and Farm Bureau-dominated coalition which last summer defeated the Pace bill containing the so-called Brannan trial run on potatoes. If the Brannan plan had been in effect on potatoes this year, the present surplus stock of potatoes would have been eaten by the consumers of this country at a price somewhat cheaper than the present support price. The growers' subsidy under the Brannan plan would certainly have cost far less than the total loss which is sustained through the complete destruction of these surplus potatoes. The taxpayer pays the bill either way, but he pays twice under the present plan; once as a taxpayer and again as a consumer in paying a higher price. Why not at least give the consumer a break and put the Brannan plan into effect on potatoes?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Did Mr. Brannan or anyone else ask the consent of Congress to import potatoes from Canada?

Mr. WHITE of California. That has to do with a treaty. It has nothing to do with Mr. Brannan.

Mr. GROSS. Or how to destroy the other crops?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, our good friend from California [Mr. WHITE], the cotton gentleman, or the gentleman who grows cotton at a profit—perhaps that is more accurate—has been yelling about potatoes. I do not know why unless it is that he wants the money that has been paid out for potatoes, eggs, corn, and the rest of the subsidies, or an equal amount to be put into cotton payments. From what he said the other day it might be argued he does not want any of the fellows in Texas or in that section of the country to grow cotton. It must all be grown in California.

I am in favor of the gentleman's program to a certain very limited extent and in a certain way. Some of my folks have been going out to California to get that pension. They have a lot of them out there, good Republicans, too, and I hope in time they do a job on some of my friends from California and send a solid Republican delegation to Congress. But after they got so many people from the East and Middle West out there, what did they do to some of them? They took a part of the pension away from them and now a few have not enough money to get back home. I might be in favor of an appropriation to get them back to good old Michigan if they want to come.

It has been very interesting to hear these statements of the folks who are all in favor of FEPC. The President is in favor of it but apparently only if it does not apply to him. You all got that little card from Texas, did you not, the answer to the FEP program of the President where he is quoted as saying, "No son of a baby is going to tell me who I can hire or fire." The statement was made when complaint was made about the character or reputation of one of the men he has around him. Guess I did not quote the President exactly—he said s. o. b., which I take to mean "son of a baby."

Then we have the Member from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS]; she was here a moment ago. She is all out for FEP, too, and to demonstrate her sincerity about it, she practices it where it will do the most good. She has a fine colored secretary or a fine competent colored girl over there in her office. That ought to show her sincerity and to get her many votes. But yesterday around noon the Member from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS] was down on the other floor below coming out of that restroom. A young lady was in a hurry on the way in. They met practically in the doorway, but the lady from California says: "This rest room is for Congresswomen only." Though the young woman was in a hurry, she turned back—making a polite apology.

Discrimination? Or was it segregation? A restricted area? Discrimination—not because of race or religion but because of lack of official status. Discrimination—because one was a Member of Congress- the other was not. Nondiscrimination is one thing in theory—something else again in practice.

Now, I do not hire anyone just to have a diversified citizenship or religious belief or conglomeration of color in my office. I had a girl who was an Episcopalian. I am a Lutheran myself. I had a girl who was a Catholic and I had a Jewish girl; a Methodist also. Race, creed, state of origin, never bothers me at all; maybe I do not have religion enough. Maybe if I did, it would bother me not at all. I think the gentleman from New York hit the nail on the head the other day when he said that the politicians wanted FEPC as a political issue. I recall when we had this swimming pool trouble here last summer in Washington and the administration shut the pools because the races did not mix quite as well as they should. I offered a suggestion; in fact, I put in a bill to give one pool to colored people, one to white people, and one for mixed use. But I did not get anywhere. None of the bills I ever put in do. [Applause.] I think that is fine; that is about the only applause I ever got. And, I will say this, you fellows do not vote in my district, so it does not make much difference to me. And I will also say this to you applauding gentlemen, I imagine you are all supporters of these labor bosses—not the labor men, rather the labor bosses, how are you going to like it when your telephone service is cut off as is threatened today? I suppose that is the same group over there doing that applauding who voted for the four freedoms for all the world, the same group that votes for legislation here in America to make it pretty hard next week when you ring your telephone or take off your receiver to get anybody to answer; the same outfit that votes for legislation which up in Michigan when it gets cold weather, leaves the folks without any coal. They cannot even heat the food they have. That is the outfit which is back of the President in his refusal to enforce the Taft-Hartley Act in the coal strike and that is the result of their policy. Look in the paper this morning: 60 Chrysler office workers want to go to work. They cannot get in. Pickets keep them out. A regular union practice—a practice which is a violation of law—a violation of a Michigan statute which the Democratic governor permits to go unpunished. I say you ought not to be proud of the legislation that denies to the American workingman the right to work.

Mr. WHITE of California. That is your bill, is it not?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. My labor bill? Do you refer to a labor bill that I introduced here some 10 years ago, under which honest American citizens could go to work without being clubbed over the head? You keep on having these goon squads rioting and cracking the men's heads, as they have been, and they will get their heads cracked. What you are asking for is civil war, and if you keep people unemployed and beat them up when they try to go to work they will follow the procedure laid down by the goon squads as the people did in California in the early days. The people who want law and order will get results, and there will be shooting, perhaps hanging as in the old days, and that is bad. I am not advocating that, so do not say I am, but that is what you are asking for if you keep on along the lines some labor bosses are following; violence begets violence. You backed John L. Lewis, you backed up Harry Bridges when he was tying up the shipyards, and here is what you get in the end. Defiance of law, and the courts, a harbor of refuge for the Communists.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No, not just now.

MY COUNTRY FIRST

I want to tell you a little bit about the people of Michigan, not in my district, but the adjoining district, PAUL SHAFER'S district, the third. Our people are much alike in their thinking. There is a project out there—I do not know who started it but could make a fair guess—to spend some Federal money on the Kalamazoo River which runs through Paul's district and through my district. They do not really need it, but it is an opportunity to get a little Federal dough. So, somebody from Michigan and a few New Dealers—and I wonder what your Governor of Michigan is going to do when they keep the people from going to work in violation of the law—the Governor, Brother Williams. Will he do anything? Probably not, except to encourage them a little bit.

Now, about this money. Do you know what our people say? They say they do not need it for flood control. There is a picture. I want the gentleman from California to look at it. See, the house is all flooded. The river water is 2 feet deep around and in the house. Now, do not get it dirty on the edge. Now, when that picture came to the desk——

Mr. WHITE of California. I just want to say this to the gentleman. He is talking about John L. Lewis and Harry Bridges. John L. Lewis is a Republican, as the gentleman is, and Harry Bridges is a third-party member. The gentleman is not talking to us Democrats.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is right. John claimed to be a Republican one time; but his UMW gave some $500,000, did it not, to the Roosevelt campaign? We have a few of those fellows on our side, and we cannot help it, but you have a majority of them. That is the trouble with your party. At the moment your president is the political captive of Murray and his crowd.

When that photo came to the desk, a girl in the office said, "Oh, oh, you are going to catch it now." She had not read the letter which came with it. They have been after me in the Kalamazoo paper out there because I was opposing this development. Listen to this letter now. It comes from the owner of the flooded house and yard. It shows the kind of people we have in Michigan, especially the western half of Michigan. This is directed to me, dated January 26.

I read:

Attached hereto is a picture of my home in Comstock taken April 8, 1947, by a photographer from the Kalamazoo Gazette. At that time there was 10 inches of water in my house, and the cost to me was $409.67 in cash outlay.

I tell you this to show that I have some knowledge of floods on the river at Kalamazoo from first-hand information.

In spite of what you might suppose, I am with you 100 percent in your position on this matter, that the expenditure of some three to ten million dollars for an alleged flood-control program is entirely unjustified at this time. That sum of money would pay for all the damage that has been caused in the past 50 years and will be caused in the next 50; it would buy all the property along Portage Creek in Kalamazoo and make it into a park.

Now, get this:

I had lived in Comstock for 40 years when I built my home where I did; I knew that once in a blue moon I might be flooded out; I built a house without a basement; with cement floors, and one that would suffer as little damage as any house could. I built it where I did because I wanted to live right there; if I were flooded out for a week every year, I'd still want to live there.

We can't have economy unless we economize and one of the ways to do it is to vote against just such schemes as this one. I'm for you.

See? There is an American who is willing to forego a private personal advantage for the country's good. God grant there were more of them everywhere—if there were and they spoke out we would not now be bankrupt as a nation in both money and principles.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I cannot. The gentleman would just tell a story.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to support this fine piece of legislation. Back in my home district of southwestern Ohio the building and loan associations have long been recognized and numbered among the most valuable assets of the community.

It is very easily realized that without these fine institutions many a home owner of today would never have been able to have become such. The building and loan associations were founded in the various neighborhoods and communities for the purpose of encouraging thrift.

Our associations in my home town of Cincinnati have had an outstanding record among lending institutions in this country of ours. I am proud of their efforts. It was my good fortune to be assistant district counsel for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in its inception in my community. The cooperation of the building and loan institutions in assisting distressed home owners to hold on to their investment and protect their homes at that time was remarkable.

I am happy to inform this body that I have the honor of being a director and counsel for the McHenry Avenue Loan and Building Association, one of these fine institutions.

The backbone of this Nation is the American home and it is a pleasure to support legislation encouraging and assisting these people who have done so much to contribute to the home life of the American of today.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, it is very hard to tell these days what kind of legislation the committee is going to bring in. When the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency was on the floor I asked him a couple of questions designed to find out what was the need for some of the provisions in this legislation. Now I find after going over the legislation myself and over the report that on pages 4 and 5 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to purchase any obligations issued by Federal home-loan banks up to $1,000,000,000. There is already authority which has never been used according to what I understood the chairman of the committee to say to loan these banks $3,000,000,000. I just do not understand the idea.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SPENCE. I was not referring to the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. I compared it with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which insures bank deposits, and said that authority to borrow $750,000,000 by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation was comparable with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which had a Treasury support of $3,000,000,000 behind it. I was not referring to any of these institutions in this bill when I mentioned the $3,000,000,000.

Mr. TABER. I understood the gentleman to say that they had authority to now borrow $3,000,000,000.

Mr. SPENCE. No, no; I did not say that.

Mr. TABER. They have no authority at all?

Mr. SPENCE. I did not intend to say anything like that. If I said that, it is clearly in error. I have no recollection of saying that. I was comparing it with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, in which the deposits of the banks were insured, and said that that Corporation had the authority to borrow $3,000,000,000 from the Treasury.

Mr. TABER. These corporations all have to contribute toward some kind of a reserve, do they not?

Mr. SPENCE. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation has assets of $213,000,000 now, and I do not think they will ever have to borrow this money. It is a psychological thing which gives confidence to the people who have deposited their money. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has never borrowed any of the $3,000,000,000 they are authorized to borrow. The people know it is behind them, and it gives stability to the institutions and confidence to the people which otherwise they would not have.

Mr. TABER. How should it be necessary without any situation presenting itself which would require us to set up authority in the Secretary of the Treasury to buy their obligations up to a billion dollars.

Mr. SPENCE. If times of stress came along it would be necessary. Now, it would not be necessary at all, but if times of stress came, it might be necessary to buy their securities.

Mr. TABER. With the funds that the home-loan banks already have, they would be able to take care of any shock and if any reserve were necessary it would be time enough for us to take care of that when the need arose.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not think so. I think if times of stress should come, this authority should exist in order that it may be used immediately.

Mr. TABER. The gentleman thinks that we should give them this authority to be used way off in the future just like that. Frankly, I am sorry I cannot agree with the judgment of the gentleman.

Mr. SPENCE. I do not think that they will ever have reason to borrow it, but the simple fact that it is there and people know it is there will give them assurance that the money will be repaid. If a great disaster should befall the financial structure of America, the money which is behind them now would be but a drop in the bucket. We all know that. It is the assurance of the people that they can get their money which has given stability to these institutions and confidence to the American people. I hope it will never be used. I do not think it will be used.

Mr. TABER. The American people do not need anything of that kind to have confidence in the institutions. Up in my territory they already have that, and they do not even belong.

This item of $750,000,000 for insurance purposes is another item that frankly there has not been any occasion arise where it was necessary to have anything of that kind. It does seem to me that we are going far afield in setting up these two funds of $1,750,000,000 which can be taken out of the Treasury without any review by the Congress, as to whether or not it is necessary. It seems to me we should not do such a thing at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-three Members are present; not a quorum.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 31]

Bennett, Mich.	Gary	Norton
Bland	Gilmer	Pace
Bosone	Gore	Pfeifer,
Brown, Ga.	Granger	Joseph L.
Buckley, Ill.	Hardy	Plumley

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TRIMBLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6743, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 357 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], I ask unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, H. R. 6743 represents an important step forward in the Government's program to provide a stable reservoir of credit for savings and home-financing institutions throughout the Nation. This bill provides a number of improvements in the basic law passed in 1932.

The importance of the Federal Home Loan bank system and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to our economy has been demonstrated beyond question during the past 18 years. Sixty-five percent of all the savings and loan asociations in the United States now are members of the Federal Home Loan Bank System. These associations hold 13 billions of dollars in assets—more than 90 percent of the total assets of such institutions throughout the Nation. Forty-six percent of the savings and loan associations in the Nation are members of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and these insured institutions hold more than $11,000,000,000 in assets.

Mr. Chairman, all of us remember the tragic conditions which led to the creation of the Federal Home Loan Bank System and the Federal Savings and Loan Corporation during the depression. We know that it is essential to provide a national pool of credit for savings and loan associations, and to provide a system of insurance for their assets.

H. R. 6743 extends the principles of existing law by establishing liquidity requirements for the savings and loan associations and providing for Treasury support of Federal home loan banks and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. These changes in the present law are highly desirable.

The great majority of savings and loan associations have recognized the need for maintaining a sufficient degree of liquidity to allow their funds to be reasonably available for withdrawal by shareholders. In my opinion, however, the establishment of liquidity requirements by statute, would provide a necessary protection for shareholders, even though this provision would have little effect upon the operations of most savings and loan associations at this time.

The establishment of liquidity requirements also is a necessary accompaniment of the provision in H. R. 6743 which would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase Federal home-loan-bank obligations up to a maximum of $1,000,000,000. Such assurance of Government support has been provided for the commercial-banking system through the Federal Reserve Banks and for the farm-credit system through the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation. There is no reason why it should not be extended to the savings and loan associations through the Home Loan Bank Board.

There is no immediate need for Government support in this field. The powers granted by H. R. 6743 would be standby powers. Nevertheless, it is essential that we authorize these support powers so that the Government may be able to act quickly in the event of an emergency. As a matter of fact, the authorization of such support powers probably would tend to prevent an emergency situation from developing.

More adequate protection of shareholders also is provided in H. R. 6743 through the provision authorizing the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to borrow up to $750,000,000 from the Treasury. This authority is similar to that presently held by the Federal deposit insurance system. It is essential to provide such protection to the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

H. R. 6743 recognizes the needs and obligations of the savings and loan associations, of their shareholders, and of the public. The associations are required by the bill to maintain a reasonable degree of liquidity. In return, the Government provides assurance of support in the event of an emergency. The legislation establishes standards and protections which already are in effect for the commercial-banking system, the farm-credit system, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. H. R. 6743 is in the public interest and it should be passed.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS].

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] had the floor, he was reading a letter wherein the writer said that he had built his house where he wanted to build it and did not care whether it was wiped away every year by the floods. I asked him to yield for a question. All I wanted to know was, was the letter written by a constituent or by a "duck"?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I was inspired to ask for this time because of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan. I do not now see him on the floor and I regret it. I would much prefer that he were here because I wanted to see if I could clarify, in his mind, some of the difficulties we folks over on our side are experiencing. In regard to our position upon certain issues that come before the Congress the gentleman from Michigan should realize that it is only natural that we are all the product of our environment and we do frequently see things differently, as we have a right to do, in this country. I think these differences are explained, to a great extent, by that sage remark that was made by our colleague from Pennsylvania, the immediate past chairman of the Republican National Committee, Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. He said that the Republican Party was constituted of the very best people in this country; cultured folks. Of course, since they have taken all the best people of the country, he figures there is no one but riffraff left for us Democrats. Consequently, we often see things in a different light than does the gentleman who associates only with the best and most cultured people.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield to our distinguished leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, you are expressing what you think the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., thinks?

Mr. JACOBS. Naturally. I am trying to explain what must have been in the mind of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]. Of course, sometimes people go through a metamorphosis. I usually refer to it as going through "the metamorphosis of gold," which seems to put at least a thin veneer of culture on some folks. The gentleman had considerable to say about our friend, John L. Lewis. You know, Mr. Lewis has been a labor leader for a great many years and he has done pretty well in the business, so he became a Republican.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. Not at this time. A few years ago, Mr. Truman was sort of checking Mr. Lewis up on some of his antics. It seemed that blood, even political blood, is thicker than water. Our Republican friends had to send those two great missionaries, the present minority leader of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] to bail him out. You remember how they got the welfare fund all fixed up with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] as the public trustee of the welfare fund. Then it turned out later, of course, that being of the best people, the salary had to be pretty good. It was $35,000, plus the emoluments of the office of Senator from New Hampshire.

So, in all businesses and occupations there are people who get out of line. We find that even some of the best and most cultured people get out of line on the GOP side, as well as the alleged riffraff over on our side.

That brings us up to another thing. I would like to address myself to my southern colleagues for a moment. There is a lot of talk about a combination between our southern colleagues and the Republicans. So I want to point out to my southern friends that the gentlemen who sit over here on the Republican side always have someone like the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] get up and make a speech, like he did a moment ago, in opposition to FEPC, that is simply bait. But let me ask my southern friends where were our Republican friends when the anti-poll-tax bill came around to the floor of this House last year? In other words, I want to show my southern friends that this combination benefits the Republican side almost exclusively, because when you folks are interested in their help they are like the little man who was not there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. Those who were here voted against you folks on that issue. So actually what they expect you to do is to support them on their issues and they always run out on you folks.

I am also reminded by the gentleman from Michigan, who is constantly talking about New Deal measures, and so forth, of the comment that has often been made on this floor. I mean the Republican opposition to killing little pigs. I have never seen so much mourning in all my life as my Republican friends have experienced over the demise of these little pigs which were killed a few years ago. I have never known of any kinfolks to mourn so long over the loss of their loved ones as my Republican friends have mourned over the death of these little pigs.

I do want to comment on another matter before I sit down. The gentleman talked about FEPC. He tells you that those who are for FEPC take their position purely for political reasons. You see, these best and most cultured folks are also possessed of occult powers. You cannot fool the gentleman from Michigan; no, sir. He is a mind reader. But I want to draw a parallel. The gentleman from Michigan was very strong for the Taft-Hartley law, which outlawed boycotts; in other words, the gentleman from Michigan was in favor of a law that would outlaw boycotts on commercial institutions—that is all right, that is good legislation—the best and most cultured folks are for it, according to him—but if we attempt to outlaw a boycott against a human race, that is bad legislation. In fact, our friends are so in love with the Taft-Hartley law that the other day when the gentleman from Utah [Mr. GRANGER] was talking about the plight of miners who were unemployed because of the depressed price of metals he was asked by my colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] if the Taft-Hartley law would not cure that evil. If there was nothing else done on that day, which you remember was devoted almost exclusively to the playing of political ping-pong, as today is being devoted, it will go down as a red-letter day in this Congress. They did finally discover one thing that the Taft-Hartley law would not cure. The fifth gospel was proven to be slightly imperfect.

Recently the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], for whom I have a great affection, was criticizing my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT]. He said the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] accused the late Senator Lodge of thwarting President Wilson's attempt to enter our country in the League of Nations. The gentleman from Ohio said our colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROOSEVELT] attacked a dead man, and he said that that was something that no man should do. That is in keeping with Mr. BROWN's generous nature, and I know he means and practices what he says. I want to say this: The gentleman from Ohio is a top leader of the Republican Party. I hope that his comment and Christian advice, being uttered as it was upon the birthday of our great wartime President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, yes, I sincerely hope that his fellow Republicans will follow his advice and example and that this marks a departure of tactics on the part of the Republican Party, generally in attacking the dead, and particularly the great man on whose birthday those words were uttered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. In just a moment.

I will say that, if that marks a departure in those tactics of attacking the memory of a great man, then I congratulate the gentleman for the speech that he made.

I now yield to my colleague from Connecticut.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the gentleman. I would just like to say that I am the grandson of the Senator to whom the gentleman from Indiana referred. I have not attacked Congressman ROOSEVELT's father. Let me also say that Mr. Lewis is a curious kind of Republican, since he contributed $500,000 to the Democratic National Committee.

Mr. JACOBS. Oh, he went through the metamorphosis of gold after he made that contribution. In fact, I know a lot of folks who have gone through that metamorphosis since Mr. Roosevelt was first elected to the Presidency, because we have enjoyed considerable prosperity since that time. I know a lot of such people who were on their uppers, who were down to cloth. They were having a doggone tough time getting along. And they were Democrats back in 1932, and they were strong Democrats. But, like Mr. Lewis and a lot of other folks, they began to get out of the woods since then, and when they got far enough out of the wilderness they became the best and most cultured people and then a lot of them became Republicans; not all of them, but some, including Mr. Lewis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Are we still debating H. R. 6743?

The CHAIRMAN. Apparently so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if when he was referring to Mr. Lewis he was not thinking about a lucrative practice? Just a short time ago I recall reading in the newspaper that certain Members of this House had a lucrative practice in labor law. Is that true?

Mr. JACOBS. May I have the time to answer?

Mr. PATTERSON. If the gentleman from New York will yield.

Mr. JACOBS. I would be very happy if you will yield a couple of minutes to me so that I may have time to answer this question.

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. After my time has expired.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. The gentleman from Indiana has referred to John L. Lewis and to other people who went through a change. Does not the gentleman agree with me that the Truman administration has gone through more changes than any other administration in history?

Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member I have not taken the well of this House very often. It seems to me that new Members of Congress might learn a lot by doing a great deal of listening and perhaps less talking. But I cannot help taking the floor at this time when my distinguished colleague from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS] has apparently raised a number of questions here which are outside of the bill we are discussing.

One of the matters he raised was FEPC. I should like to point out to the gentleman that as Republicans we do not do so much talking but we act, and I should like to point out also that there are 10 States that now have a FEPC or antidiscrimination laws in regard to employment. I am proud to say that my

State of New York was one of the first. We enacted that law in 1945 under a Republican Governor, Thomas E. Dewey.

We have had some great governors in New York State. In that State prior to 1942 for 20 years we had Democratic governors, including the great Governor Alfred E. Smith, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Sr., Governor Lehman, and Governor Poletti, but none of those gentlemen were ever able or ever made the attempt to enact an antidiscrimination law. It was up to the Republicans to do that and we did it.

In 1945 New Jersey under a Republican administration enacted a similar law. In 1945 Wisconsin under a Republican administration enacted a similar law. In 1945 Indiana under a Republican administration enacted a similar law. Massachusetts was perhaps a little more liberal under a Democratic governor and a Republican legislature because that State in 1946 enacted such a law. Connecticut in 1947 under a Republican administration enacted that law, as did Oregon in the same year. Washington with a Republican governor and a Republican senate and a Democratic house in 1949 enacted that law and finally, Mr. Chairman, in 1949 New Mexico and Rhode Island under Democratic administrations saw fit to do the same.

Mr. Chairman, this Congress has been democratically controlled for a good many years. If you are really serious about what you want to do or in what you are trying to lead us to believe you want to do, you will quit all of these parliamentary tactics and get down to brass tacks and we on this side of the aisle will vote for FEPC.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I listened with considerable interest to my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS]. Now, he referred to some matters that I felt I ought to comment on. He shelled the woods and he also covered the waterfront, so it takes a good deal of latitude to talk about the various and sundry matters that he seemed to be finding fault with.

Now, we will begin with the attack he made on one of my constituents. Mr. John L. Lewis is a very distinguished constituent of mine. I love my constituents, and they have tolerated me for a good many years; and when anybody gets on the floor of the House and proceeds to lambast one of my constituents, I feel called upon to make some slight remarks in their behalf.

I do not know how many of you know Mr. John L. Lewis. Personally, he is a very courteous and nice gentleman. I get along fine with him. In public, now, he does jump on me and gives me a right smart woolin' sometimes. But, we understand each other pretty well, you know, and I try to be kind to him, and I do not think he even votes against me down in my district. So, I do not feel like this attack on my constituent ought to go unanswered.

Now, let me say this to you: It has been said he has been a Democrat and he has been a Republican, and maybe he has been a mugwump, and he might have been an American Laborite. But, that is his privilege. That is what this United States of ours is. A fellow has a right to belong to any party he wants to and change it every day, as he changes his shirt, if that is his desire. So, I do not think my friend ought to criticize my constituent John L. for that.

Now, I will tell you all the trouble about John L. It is not John L. Lewis. Everybody jumps on John L. Lewis because he does this and he will not let you have coal. Is it John L. Lewis' fault? No, indeed. The fault lies right here in the Congress of the United States. If you had the courage to do it, this Congress could enact a bill today that would put John L. Lewis out of business, and everyone of you knows that. Do not stand up here and criticize John L. Lewis for what John L. Lewis is doing. John L. Lewis is doing the things that this Congress has given him a charter and a permit to do over the years. John L. Lewis is operating the most disastrous monopoly in this country. He has been doing it for years, and you know he has been doing it, and you sit here complacently, and when I bring a bill up to stop that sort of thing, I cannot get it out of the committee of which the distinguished gentleman from Indiana is a member. Oh, no. He will get up and criticize John L. Lewis, but when it comes to passing a bill that will correct the evils, oh, no, we could not do that; we might step on the toes of Mr. Philip Murray; maybe we might step on the toes of Mr. William Green. That would never do in a Democratic Congress.

Now, my friends, let us consider this, because this is a serious question. In the enactment of your monopoly laws, you specifically exempt labor unions from the operation of monopoly laws. All you have to do is take that act and just take your pencil and strike out the exemption of Mr. Lewis and the rest of his cohorts from the monopoly laws of this country, and you have cured the whole situation. Then my friend from Indiana will not have to get up here any more and abuse Mr. John L. Lewis. No, there is no use in using that whipping boy. All my friend from Indiana has to do is introduce such a bill and get it out of your committee and get this House to pass it and then see if there is enough courage over in another body to pass it over there, and get the President to sign it. Of course, that might be a little difficult, but my friend from Indiana stands well with the administration, and I am sure that if he went down there and laid before the President the facts I have laid before you now, that all you have to do is take a pencil and mark out three lines in the bill, and you have cured the whole situation, we would not have to sit here and use the time of this Congress talking about Mr. John L. Lewis, my distinguished constituent.

I will pass from that question.

My friend from Indiana undertook to reprimand the Republican side and reprimand us southern Democrats, because, he said, we had a combination. He wanted to tell us the Republicans were not the friends of us southern fellows. I have known that all the time, but what has disturbed me is that the Democrats are not the friends of us southern fellows.

Let me ask you in all seriousness, who has kept the Democratic Party alive in the bad times? Oh, it is very well to come down here when the Democrats are in power and when you can exert some influence and get some patronage, and so forth, and talk about "We are the Democratic Party," but who kept the Democratic Party alive in the bad times? It was the South. You would not have any Democratic Party today if it had not been for the loyalty of these Southern States.

Now you turn upon the southern people for the purpose of getting a few votes—that is all, and you know it—for the purpose of getting a few votes from a few minority groups, that probably you are not going to get, anyway. You are willing to cut the throats of the people who kept your party alive through the years.

As for the Republicans being our friends, of course, they are not our friends. Who said they were our friends? Have they not had the same plank in their platforms over the years that the New Deal Democrats have recently adopted in the last couple of platforms to try to toll away these minority groups from the Republican Party?

No, we down South do not have any friends. We have to stand up here and sometimes resort to filibusters, even, to try to keep you people from imposing upon the southern people things that you know and we know just do not comport with the traditions of the South and cannot work and will not work, and neither race wants them to work.

My friends, stop and think about a few of these things. Stop and think about this FEPC, that both sides of the aisle are trying to force on a helpless southern people.

This is not anything new. People have been raising in this Chamber the question of racial prejudice and using the southern people as a whipping boy for a hundred years. It is not anything new.

I wonder if the time is ever going to come when this Congress will sit down seriously and reflect upon a return to the fundamentals, refer once in awhile to the great Constitution given you by your forefathers, and go back to that great document. There was a reason for every line, every word, every comma, and every period in it. Let us go back to fundamentals a little bit.

They call me a reactionary. I am proud to be a reactionary when I stand upon the principles that George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and the rest of those great patriots stood on when they created this Nation. Let us go back to some of their principles and find out what this Constitution is all about.

Do you know that your powers in this Congress are limited?

Do you know that the States under the Constitution have reserved unto themselves all the rights of government that are not specifically given to the Congress? And where have you wandered away? Is there anything in the whole field of legislation or appropriation which this Congress has hesitated to enact on account of that Constitution? What right has the Congress to appropriate the tax money of the people of the United States for things which the Constitution does not authorize? You do it every day and you have done it day after day and time and again with many of my Republican friends, to my deep regret, voting for them. We have done those things day after day and year after year and Congress after Congress until the Treasury of the United States is not only bankrupt, but worse than bankrupt.

All of you who are within the sound of my voice know it. But do we hear anybody get up and talk about that? Oh, no. We will talk about the FEPC and how much money we are going to give to this group and what appropriation we are going to make for that group in the hopes that it is going to get you some votes in the next election. Do you think the American people have sunk so low that their votes can be bought and sold on the barrel head with the people's money?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JACOBS]. I presume to appear as a witness in rebuttal.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, in the 3 minutes I have allotted to me I perhaps can do no more than answer the question which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. PATTERSON] asked me. That was about my law practice before I was elected to Congress.

First of all you will note I say my law practice before I was elected to Congress because I had the notion when I was elected to Congress that my duty was here and that my attention should be undivided. Therefore, I closed my law practice and am not in the practice of law now. I do not know how many men in this Chamber can say that they have no other interest than their duties as a Congressman. I can say so. I can also say in reference to campaign funds that I never took a dime from anyone. I financed myself. That brings me to the question the gentleman asked me as to whether or not I had enjoyed a lucrative law practice. I did. I am not ashamed of it. Whether it was right or wrong, I had the people in my district and in the State of Indiana thinking I was a pretty fair lawyer. Thinking so, they paid money for my services—and I took the money. It is a sort of a profit motive, I would like to point out to my Republican friends—and I thought you were for it. But of course I might be mistaken. Maybe they are not for the profit motive except for themselves. Maybe it makes a difference.

Personally, I believe in a man being compensated for his services. I made a good deal of money practicing law, not only in the labor practice—I had been substantially out of labor law practice for a period of about 3 years before I was elected to Congress. I found I could make more money representing other people, if you want me to tell the truth about it—and being a believer in the profit motive, as you folks proclaim to be, I had more or less veered toward those clients who could pay bigger fees. I did not do too badly. I can imagine that the gentleman is a very avid reader of Westbrook Pegler because he is the one that gave publicity to the fact that I had made some money practicing law.

Some of his statements are accurate and some are inaccurate. But that does not matter. He said I made $300,000 in 2 years. That is not accurate—I regret to say. One of my colleagues said, "Why do you not sue him for libel?" I said, "Shucks, that is not libel." And it would not be libel to say some of the best and most cultured people made that much. My Republican friends who admire Pegler apparently think that they have a monopoly, not only on the idea of free enterprise, but on the right to make a profit.

When Pegler got to saying things that were not correct—I just want to tell you Republicans something about the author that you read so avidly—I went back to 1936 and found where Westbrook Pegler had advised the Communist Party on June 19, 1936—you get a copy of the Communist Daily Worker and you will find it there with his picture and all—he advised the Communist Party to come out under a new front and call themselves the People's Party. Well, I made that public and like Fulton Lewis, Jr., who once switched to Calvert's, Pegler let up on me and switched back to the Roosevelts as an almost steady diet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, my position with the Banking and Currency Committee has no senority to give it prestige. My seat in the committee is deep in the well. In the well are four liberals from large, urban centers, who were washed here by the people in the elections of 1948 and who take seriously the mandates of their constituents. I think all of us in that well are for this bill that we are more or less discussing today, because it offers to translate the dream of a home, owned by the people living in that home, to a reality.

I should not have spoken today unless I had been moved and puzzled by the eloquence of my learned, distinguished, and beloved friend from Wisconsin. I wish to believe that he did not intend the implications of his remarks. The lips may have been giving language to something perhaps that was in his heart, but knowing so well the generous and lovable personal attributes of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin this I cannot accept. But when the distinguished gentleman, whether intending it or not, placed an aspersion upon people, good, honest, decent men and women who lived in homes that they did not own, then I felt that I had to speak.

I have the privilege now of calling the attention of the House to a statement just issued by a great American woman, Mrs. Katharine F. Lenroot, Director of the Children's Bureau of the Federal Security Agency. This is the statement, just issued:

> The Children's Bureau is a strong believer in the values of the American tradition of home ownership, but we would not want to be in the position of saying that the people who cannot own their own homes cannot have a stable home life.

My colleagues, many of my constituents do not own their homes. I would say the most of them do not. Are we to accept the concept that one who does not own the roof under which he lives and rears his children is less possessed than others more fortunate of love of country and a desire to build, through family and community life, this society of ours into the greatest society of contentment and God-fearing people that the world has ever known?

Why does my beloved colleague from Wisconsin assail the noble Katharine Lenroot and her coworkers in the Children's Bureau for holding before the eyes of the parents of America that while ownership of home is certainly the laudable desire of every American family, nevertheless it is the character of the family life within the home, and not who holds the title to the physical property that counts?

If it be propaganda to suggest that it is the warmth and strength of virtuous family life that contribute to the healthy upbringing of children, and not who owns the deed to property, then must my distinguished friend and colleague from Wisconsin dismiss as just another bit of propaganda the Sermon on the Mount.

Certainly we liberals from the North are for this bill, because, as our great chairman has so well said, it offers a substantial help to people who desire to own their homes. We dream of the day when every American family may be domiciled under a roof owned by that family. But, unfortunately today, in the great city of Chicago, from which I come, most of the men, women, and children are living under roofs that are rented. Many of them do not have the money to buy a home.

I think that my father was as patriotic and fine a man as ever lived, and no nobler character ever lived than my mother. I was born under a roof that was a rented roof. All the years of my youth I spent as a child under a rented roof. When I was married, a young man in the same position as most young men in America, I had no home that I owned to go to. I rented my roof. I do not intend to remain silent when the implication of words uttered on this floor are that love and virtue and all the other ennobling qualities of human character are not distributed equally to those who have and those who have not.

The day will come when every American family will have its own home. That is the goal for the attainment of which we are dedicated. Our sincerity we proved in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress when we provided not only for slum clearance and public housing, but for extensive and exhaustive research to bring actual home ownership within the reach of all. Our sincerity we are now proving in the Banking and Currency Committee in our work on proposed legislation to bring the kind of housing all Americans should have within the reach of the one-third of our population in the middle-income group.

But until the day is actually here, and every American family does have its own home, I hope that my colleagues who have opposed in this Eighty-first Congress everything that we have endeavored to do to reach the goal will refrain from further reflection upon those who live under rented roofs.

In closing may I say to my friends from the South: I find you, my colleagues from Dixieland, fine, warm-hearted, sincere men. As men and as friends, I have great admiration for you; I have affection for you. I know how great have been the contributions of the South to democratic causes; but you cannot understand that those of us who are coming down here by the will of the generation of today represent a new concept, or an old concept in new form, that there must be no boycott of a race, that there must no place be permitted to rear itself the ugly head of discrimination, and that all humankind shall have equal opportunity in these United States, and that in all of this we are as sincere as sincerity itself. Everyday the brotherhood of man comes closer. The period of man's inhumanity to man has reached the end of an epoch. The responsibility that has come to us with world leadership commands that the customs and the thinking of a dead-and-buried era shall be discarded.

I have no doubt that soon the chivalrous spirit of a great Southland, which gave us Jefferson and Jackson and so much that has enriched the lives of the common people of America, will show itself with all its brilliant force on the side of a democracy marching forward, a democracy purified because no longer has it the taint of cruel discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it may seem peculiar, but I am going to try to speak to the bill and attempt to clear up some of the uncertainty and confusion that seems to prevail in respect to this bill.

The Home Loan Bank System, headed by the Home Loan Bank Board, was set up under President Hoover back in 1932. It was set up for the purpose of making available a system of home-loan banks which might operate in the discount and purchase of real-estate paper similar to the manner in which the Federal Reserve banks operate in respect to commercial and other loans. It will be remembered that at that time there was a tightening in respect to the real-estate market. The home-loan banks were set up for the purpose of creating a situation where the banks could liquidate enough of their real-estate holdings to make an expansion of home building credit possible.

Under the Home Loan Bank Board there is set up the home loan banks and Federal savings and loan associations which were later set up, and State building and loan associations may come into this system. Let us compare the system to the Federal Reserve in another respect, that all of the members of the Federal savings and loan associations must be members of the system in the same manner as all national banks must be members of the Federal Reserve System. All of the State-chartered building and loan associations may become members of the system in the same manner that State banks may become members of the Federal Reserve System. Now, to prevent withdrawals from the banks, as a means of recreating confidence in the banks and as a very material influence toward the stability of the American economy, back in 1933 we set up the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation which insured the deposits in all banks that participated, whether they were Federal or State banks.

A comparable agency has been set up under the Home Loan Bank Board known as the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation insures what you may call the deposits in Federal building and loan associations and in State building and loan associations. They are not called deposits. So that there will not be too much confusion we may refer to them as deposits. They insure up to $5,000 of the certificates the same as the FDIC insures the first $5,000 of deposits in banks.

When the FDIC was first set up it was set up to insure only $2,500, and the banks, in order to have their deposits insured, paid a premium rate of one-eighth of 1 percent. Later the coverage was increased to $5,000. Later on the FDIC insurance premium was reduced from one-eighth of 1 percent to one-twelfth of 1 percent.

When the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation was set up we provided a coverage of $5,000 and we provided the same rate of premium as then had to be paid for FDIC, one-eighth of 1 percent. This bill reduces that premium of one-eighth of 1 percent to one-twelfth of 1 percent. That has been done by this House before. The bill was passed almost unanimously on one, perhaps two occasions. There should be no controversy in regard to that. It gives them the same but no more advantage than the banks have in respect to their premiums.

There was a discrepancy and a decided disadvantage to the savings and loan and building and loan associations, an inconsistency when viewed in light of the FDIC. The building and loan associations and the savings and loan associations were under the law susceptible to an assessment to make up losses over and above the capital and resources of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. No comparable provision was contained in any of the FDIC Acts.

To further bring the two acts and the services into harmony we have removed that, and instead of that provision we have provided a comparable liquidity on the part of Federal savings and loan associations and the member building and loan associations which if they were banks would be called reserves. The reserves of banks vary according to whether they are in Reserve cities or so-called country districts. We have provided in this bill that in lieu of the provisions in respect to assessments we require a certain amount of liquidity. The bill as introduced provided for a liquidity at the discretion of the home-loan bank of from 5 to 15 percent. That seemed to be a little bit out of balance with the reserve requirements that the banks had to maintain, so the committee, as a committee amendment, reduced that amount to from 4 to 8 percent.

In the third case we bring the two acts into closer harmony and remove some of the so-called discriminatory provisions. Up to the present time the Federal Government has not participated in any manner in respect to the Federal Savings and Loan Corporation assets, and the meeting of their liabilities, but the Federal Treasury can, under the law, participate up to $3,000,000,000 in losses chargeable against the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

In keeping with the ratio of obligations between the banks and the savings and loan associations, we have set a ceiling on that figure of $750,000,000, so that in addition to the $239,000,000 of capital and reserve the Federal Government theoretically could, put $750,000,000 into the fund to prevent losses, and perhaps save our economy, because so much of our savings depoits are invested in home loans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

We felt that if anything serious happened to the home-loan market that there would be a decided influence upon the stability of our economy, and that if it were good business, and it is not denied that it is good business, to have a cushion of $3,000,000,000 behind FDIC obligations, it was just as good business and perhaps better to have a cushion of $750,000,000 behind the Federal Savings and Loan Inurance Corporation.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. Should not the FDIC cushion be expanded by increasing the amount of insurance from $5,000 to $10,000, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think there are bills being drafted, if not introduced, to do that, and I can assure the gentleman that we will give very sympathetic consideration to the proposals.

Now, we have discussed here today another provision in the bill which has to do with $1,000,000,000 which the Federal Treasury may make available. That is in respect to the purchase of the assets of the Federal Home Loan Banks, and in order to get that $1,000,000,000 there is a further cushion against the liquidity of the savings and loans, and building and loan associations. Home-loan banks may sell to the Treasury this paper which they have. Now, have in mind that these mortgages are secured by real estate only; that these associations cannot make loans other than real-estate loans. Against any of the loans or purchases which the Treasury makes up to this $1,000,000,000 the Treasury will have as security for any part of that $1,000,000,000 the homes which are being purchased by the American citizens, which I personally consider to be the best security which the Federal Treasury could possibly acquire. The only possible loss to the Federal Treasury lies in such a collapse of our economy as to virtually be the end of the American system of government.

The end of the American system of government will come in other ways. It will not come in consequence of this bill because if there was ever a free-enterprise bill it is this bill.

This bill provides for the creation of private capital with which to build homes, and removes, in proportion as we make this credit available, the threat of direct Government loans, which in themselves might cause such serious influence on our economy as to make it impossible to preserve the American way of life.

I am very strongly for this bill because I think it is the American way of building homes, and I hope the House will support the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is a fact, is it not, that this bill was reported unanimously by the committee?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know whether or not all the members were there, but I think it was a unanimous report.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eight Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman. I am today introducing a bill which I believe will effect significant economies and will in no way impair the benefits of the individuals concerned. Moreover, it will correct inequities in the treatments among individuals who are trained as career officers of our armed forces.

As a result of a study by the Government Operation Subcommittee, of which I am chairman, it has been found that it is currently costing the Federal Government an amount in excess of $285,000 a year to insure Annapolis midshipmen under the national service life-insurance program.

During the past 3 years, fortunately, there have occurred only two deaths at the United States Naval Academy. This mortality rate is typical of the experience over the past two decades. For the United States Government to continue to pay an amount over a quarter of a million dollars annually to provide NSLI protection for Annapolis midshipmen when the mortality experience of these men is far below normal risk appears to be a most unnecessary expenditure of Government funds.

These midshipmen are subject to flight-training activities and are contributing much to the military potential and subsequent national defense of the United States. I am in complete accord with the desire of the Congress that these men be granted insurance protection.

Therefore, I am offering a bill which would amend section 13 of Public Law 729 of the Seventy-ninth Congress. This legislation will provide for a lump-sum payment of $10,000 to the survivor or survivors of any midshipmen who die while enrolled at the United States Naval Academy.

By this action, a significant saving of Federal funds can be effected. The Navy has requested an appropriation of $277,000 for fiscal 1951 for the payment of premiums to the NSLI fund. This figure does not include administrative costs of either the Navy or the Veterans' Administration. Under this legislation cost for providing the protection to the survivors of midshipmen can be reduced to an estimated $30,000. This figure is most liberal and does not take into account the increased efficiency in administration which would result. Savings would, therefore, be at least $247,000 for fiscal 1951 and at least that amount every year thereafter.

Another provision of this bill would correct inequities which now exist between benefits being provided midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy and the cadets at West Point and the Coast Guard Academy. Under existing statutes cadets at West Point and the Coast Guard Academy are not granted any insurance protection and have been declared ineligible to apply for national service life insurance even on a personal, self-paying basis because these cadets are not on active duty. The bill which I am today introducing would also provide a lump-sum survivor payment of $10,000 in the event of death of any cadet enrolled at the United States Military Academy or the United States Coast Guard Academy. I am confident the Congress desires that this discrimination be removed.

Although my bill would provide coverage for many more individuals than are now insured, I am convinced that the cost to the Government will be less than one-fifth the amount currently required to provide national service life insurance protection for Annapolis midshipmen alone.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE].

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, I have listened, as I am sure all the Members of the House have, to the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] in behalf of this legislation with appreciation and approval. I am sure all of us and the people throughout America have such an outstanding appreciation of our local building and loan associations that none of us would lose the opportunity to say some kind word in behalf of this great enterprise that has functioned so splendidly throughout our country. I am sure that the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan, and well stated it was, is shared by all Members of the House, and that this bill will be speedily enacted into law.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I am sure there is no substantial opposition to this bill. We have no further requests for time and I ask that the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding the following new section after section 5 thereof:

"SEC. 5A. No member of a Federal home loan bank shall make or purchase any loan at any time when its cash and obligations of the United States are not equal to such amount as the Home Loan Bank Board shall by regulations prescribe: Provided, That such amount shall not be less than 5 percent or more than 15 percent of the obligation of the member on withdrawable accounts or, in the case of any member insurance company, such other base as the Board may determine to be comparable. The Board is authorized in said regulations to prescribe from time to time different amounts, within the limitations hereinbefore specified, for different classes of member institutions, and for such purposes the Board is authorized to classify such members according to type of institution, size, location, rate of withdrawals, or such other basis or bases of differentiation as the Board may deem to be reasonably necessary or appropriate for effectuating the purposes hereof. Failure to comply with the provisions hereof shall constitute ground for removal from membership. This section shall be effective 6 months after the date of its enactment."

Committee amendment:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the figure "5" and insert the figure "4."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Committee amendment:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the figure "15" and insert the figure "8."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SPENCE:

Capitalize the first letter of each of the words "home loan bank" where such words appear as follows: Page 1, line 6; page 2, line 20; page, 3, line 4; page 3, line 10; page 3, line 16; page 3, line 24; page 5, line 22; page 6, line 2.

And on page 5, line 2, strike out the quotation marks at the end thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 6 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by the addition of the following new subsection:

"(1) Within 1 year after the enactment of this amendment, each member of each Federal home loan bank shall acquire and hold and thereafter maintain its stock holding in an amount equal to at least 2 percent of the aggregate of the unpaid principal of such member's home mortgage loans, home-purchase contracts, and similar obligations, but not less than $500. Such stock in excess of the amount hereby required may be purchased from time to time by members and may be retired from time to time as heretofore. One year after the enactment of this amendment, each Federal home loan bank shall retire and pay off at par an amount of its stock held by the Secretary of the Treasury equivalent to the amount of its stock held by its members in excess of the amount required to be held by them by the first two sentences of subsection (c) of this section immediately prior to the enactment of this amendment and annually thereafter each Federal home loan bank shall retire an amount of such Government stock equivalent to 50 percent of the net increase of its stock held by members since the last previous retirement: Provided, That none of such Government capital shall at any time be retired so as to reduce the aggregate capital stock, reserves, surplus, and individed profits of the Federal home loan banks to less than $200,000,000: Provided further, That notwithstanding any provision of this subsection, nothing in this subsection shall limit or affect the operation of subsection (g) of this section."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 19, strike out "(I)" and insert "(1)."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Subsection (g) of section 11 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(g) Each Federal home-loan bank shall at all times have at least an amount equal to the current deposits received from its members invested in (1) obligations of the United States, (2) deposits in banks or trust companies, (3) advances with a maturity of not to exceed 1 year which are made to members or nonmember borrowers, upon such terms and conditions as the Board may prescribe, and (4) advances with a maturity of not to exceed 1 year which are made to members or nonmember borrowers whose creditor liabilities (not including advances from the Federal home loan bank) do not exceed 5 percent of their net assets, and which may be made without the security of home mortgages or other security, upon such terms and conditions as the Board may prescribe."

SEC. 4. Section 11 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(i) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to purchase any obligations issued pursuant to this section, as heretofore, now, or hereafter in force and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, are extended to include such purchases. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine, any of the obligations acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such obligations under this subsection shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall not at any time purchase any obligations under this subsection if such purchase would increase the aggregate principal amount of his then outstanding holdings of such obligations under this subsection to an amount greater than $1,000,000,000. Each purchase of obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a return at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the making of such purchase."

"(j) Notwithstanding the provisions of the first sentence of section 202 of the Government Corporation Control Act, audits by the General Accounting Office of the financial transactions of a Federal home loan bank shall not be limited to periods during which Government capital has been invested therein. The provisions of the first sentence of subsection (d) of section 303 of the Government Corporation Control Act shall not apply to any Federal home loan bank."

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the majority leader if he can inform the House with reference to the program for the balance of the week and any other information that he may have available.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes, I will be glad to do that.

The Committee on Rules has reported out a rule on the oleomargarine bill, to take it from the Speaker's desk and send it to conference. That will be the first order of business tomorrow.

Then the next order of business will be H. R. 3001, the admission of aliens of certain skills. That was programed for yesterday, but on account of the cotton acreage quota bill not being finished, we were unable to take it up.

Then there is H. R. 6616 and S. 88, which were on the program for Thursday and Friday. Probably one of them will not be taken up. We can put one of them over until Monday.

While I am not prepared to give the program for next week, I may say that the Far Eastern Economic Aid Act of 1950 will be taken up on Tuesday.

I can also state that the Calendar of Committees will be called on Calendar Wednesday. But outside of these two matters I am unable to state what else may come up.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. I wish to inquire from the distinguished majority leader whether there will be any further program this afternoon, assuming the pending bill is disposed of?

Mr. McCORMACK. That, of course, is a matter within the control of the House. I know of none. I assume that those of us who are anxious to have an FEPC bill brought up sometime are satisfied with the fact that one committee has been disposed of on Calendar Wednesday. I cannot speak for others, but I assume that when the Committee rises and this bill is dosposed of, the gentleman from Kentucky will move to adjourn, but adjournment is within the wisdom and judgment and subject to the will of the House.

Mr. COLMER. The gentleman understands, of course, that there are some of us who are not so anxious for the FEPC bill to come up. That was the purpose of the inquiry. The leader usually sets the score pretty well here.

Mr. McCORMACK. Not on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. COLMER. I still think he does.

Mr. McCORMACK. I assume that the gentleman is satisfied in that two committees have not been called today. The proponents of FEPC while not satisfied are contented that one committee has been called; so I assume that while there is not complete happiness on either side, there is a general feeling of harmony and contentment.

Mr. COLMER. So far as this side is concerned we would be perfectly willing to adjourn when action on the pending bill is completed.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield.

Mr. SPENCE. Let me say that when the pending bill is passed, and I hope that will be soon, when the House has taken official action on the pending bill, I shall move to adjourn. It would be an act of futility to stay in session any longer unless we desire to punish ourselves, and I doubt if we have any wish to do that.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's observation is consistent with what I assumed the gentleman would do. Are there further inquiries, I may ask the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Inasmuch as this is rather important, FEPC legislation was mentioned a moment ago, that I should state for the information of the House that the FEPC bill was not called up in the Committee on Rules today because of the absence of the chairman and one other member, and because of the promise made by the gentleman who now addresses the House to the chairman that he would be protected during his absence in his right to vote on that important measure.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I say that I hesitate to enter into the intricacies of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Was the word "trickery" or "intricacy"?

Mr. McCORMACK. "Intricacy."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Section 402 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended by the addition of the following new subsection:

"(h) After the effective date of this subsection the Corporation is authorized and directed to pay off and retire annually at par an amount of its capital stock equal to 50 percent of its net income for the fiscal year, unless the Home Loan Bank Board by resolution shall determine that a smaller amount shall be retired. Such payments shall be made promptly after the end of each fiscal year (beginning with the first fiscal year which begins after the date of enactment of this subsection) until the entire capital stock is retired. In lieu of any and all unpaid dividends, whether for any present, past, or future period, on its capital stock, all of which dividends are hereby waived, the Corporation shall pay to the Secretary of the Treasury, promptly after the end of each fiscal year (beginning with the first fiscal year which begins after the date of enactment of this subsection) a return on the average amount, at par, of its capital stock outstanding during such fiscal year at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the sixth month of such fiscal year. The retirement of such capital stock shall not affect the applicability to said Corporation of the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: On page 6, line 9, after the word "year", insert a period and strike out the balance of the sentence.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill and I am sure after the long day that we have given our undivided attention and labor to this particular piece of legislation everybody will now be willing to go along and pass this very good bill that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has been so patient in giving us time to consider thoughtfully.

The amendment I have offered is a serious amendment and I hope it will be adopted. This insuring company that insures the deposits of these home loan and building associations provided originally that the Government should supply a capital of hundreds of millions of dollars. We voted that money out of the Treasury. This bill provides that from now on and in due time the corporation shall use 50 percent of its net earnings to pay back into the Treasury of the United States the money that the Treasury put up. That is a fine idea and I am sure we are all for it. I am sure that if we can get any money back out of any of these Government corporations everybody wants to do so. I am for it down to that point.

But there is a little gimmick in this thing. I refer to the proviso which reads "unless the Home Loan Bank Board by resolution shall determine that a smaller amount shall be retired."

That in effect just repeals what you have done in the first part of the sentence. In other words, they are required to pay back 50 percent of their earnings to the Federal Treasury unless the Home Loan Bank Board says, "No, you need not pay it back." What is the use putting it in at all if you are going to put that gimmick in it?

Let us get as much money back into a crippled and depleted Treasury as we can.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. It is rather difficult to make any argument against the gentleman's amendment. Personally I have no objection to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Section 402 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended by the addition of the following new subsection:

"(i) The Corporation is authorized to borrow from the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to loan to the Corporation on such terms as may be fixed by the Corporation and the Secretary, such funds as in the judgment of the Home Loan Bank Board are from time to time required for insurance purposes, not exceeding in the aggregate $750,000,000 outstanding at any one time, and the Corporation hereafter shall not exercise its borrowing power under the first sentence of subsection (d) of this section for the purpose of borrowing money from any other source: Provided, That each such loan shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the making of such loan: Provided further, That nothing in this subsection shall prevent the Corporation from issuing debentures in accordance with the provisions of subsection (b) of section 405. For the purposes of this subsection the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as now or hereafter in force, are hereby extended to include such loans. Any such loan shall be used by the Corporation solely in carrying out its functions with respect to such insurance. All loans and repayments under this subsection shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States."

SEC. 7. Subsection (a) of section 404 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended by striking out "one-eighth" where it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "one-twelfth."

SEC. 8. Subsection (b) of section 404 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is repealed and stricken out.

SEC. 9. Subsection (c) of section 404 of the National Housing Act, as amended, is redesignated subsection (b) and amended to read as follows:

"(b) If an insured institution has paid a premium at a rate in excess of one-twelfth of 1 percent of the total amount of the accounts of its insured members and its creditor obligations for any period of time after June 30, 1949, it shall receive a credit upon its future premiums in an amount equal to the excess premium so paid for the period beyond such date."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 8, line 1, after the word "the", insert the words "Secretary of the."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: In section 204 (g) after the word "corporation" and preceding the last sentence insert a new sentence as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any member of the Federal Home Loan Bank to advertise that its deposits are insured by the Federal Treasury or that it is federally insured or to make any similar statement other than that it is a member of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it is understood, of course, by the House that this Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation is a corporation incorporated for the purpose of insuring deposits, which is a very good thing. It insures deposits up to $5,000 in these home-loan banks. Section G of the original act undertakes to provide that there shall be no deceptive advertisement by these building associations as to who insures their deposits; in other words, their deposits are not insured by the Government. They are insured by a corporation which gets its assets partly from the Government and partly from premiums that it charges for the purpose of this insurance. But, the practice has grown up throughout the country of using this expression, and I quote from an advertisement of one of these associations: "Savings up to $5,000 federally insured."

Now, the evident purpose of that is to lead the public to think that these deposits are insured by the Federal Treasury, which is not the case. There is a section in the original act which undertakes to take care of that but it is not quite broad enough to cover this particular kind of advertising I am talking about. But, the original act does endeavor to guard against false advertising.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RABAUT. Are they not insured by the FDIC?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No. They are insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

Mr. RABAUT. Well, that is the same thing, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No.

Mr. RABAUT. Is that a Federal corporation?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is incorporated by the Government, yes; and the Government furnishes the capital.

Mr. RABAUT. Where does the capital come from?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The capital came out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. RABAUT. Well, is that not straining at something?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No. If the gentleman will just permit me to answer.

Mr. RABAUT. I do not quite understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Well, the gentleman will not keep quiet long enough for me to answer.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the deposit insurance that is granted to the so-called depositors in the building and loan associations does not have the same Federal protection that the depositors in the bank have.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. They are two different corporations.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. But they have the same Federal sponsorship.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes. The national banks are required to have a sign in their banks stating that they are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Now, if the building associations were required to do the same thing, there would be no deception, that is, if they merely said, "We are members of the Federal Home Loan Insurance Corporation." But, that is not what they do. They say, "We are federally insured" or "Our depositors are federally insured," which they are not.

Mr. RABAUT. What do the banks say?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The banks say, "We are members of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation."

Mr. RABAUT. What do they say in their advertising?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have never seen any advertising that they are federally insured, and if they did, they should not be permitted to do that.

Mr. RABAUT. Well, they do.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Then they should be prohibited from doing that.

Mr. RABAUT. The reason I am speaking about that is that what one of the groups does the other group ought to be permitted to do, and we should not be championing a bankers' bill here when we know they are absolutely different.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. They should both be put on the same level. If any bank has ever advertised that way, I have never heard of it. But, it is universal, so far as I have seen, for this kind of advertisement to come from the building associations, and it makes people think that they are insured by the Federal Government, which is not the case. I think it is not exactly truthful, at the same time, and ought to be corrected.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment we have not had an opportunity to discuss or consider. It has never been presented to the committee. It is a far-reaching amendment. I think it springs from the natural antagonism of some of the banks to the building and loan associations.

I know of no provision in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation law that would limit the banks as this limits the savings and loan associations. To prevent the savings and loan associations from saying anything about their insurance, which gives stability to the institutions and which attracts depositors, to say that they could not comment on it except to say they are members of the Home Loan Bank System—such a limitation of their authority and their right to advertise themselves properly, it seems to me, ought not to be adopted in this manner without any consideration and without any submission of this question to the committee or to the Congress except at this particular time. I ask that the amendment be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLSON) there were—ayes 35, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee: Add a new section to read as follows:

"That section 405 (a) of the National Housing Act as amended be amended by striking out '$5,000' and inserting in lieu thereof '$10,000.'"

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not any consideration was given this amendment by the committee, but I have been reading the report of the committee and also the hearings. I have noticed that the executive manager of the National Savings and Loan League said this:

Still another matter that we respectfully suggest be considered by this committee is the increasing of the amount of an insured account from $5,000 to $10,000. In view of the decline of the purchasing power of the dollar since the Insurance Corporation was established in 1934, we think such increase is consistent, reasonable, and desirable.

As the Members know, when this act was passed, the deposits of depositors were insured up to $5,000. It seems to me if there are sufficient reserves, the amount should be increased from $5,000 to $10,000. I understand that similar consideration has been given to amending the Federal Deposit Insurance Act so as to insure deposits in banks up to $10,000. I believe we should insure the deposits in these building and loan and savings associations up to $10,000.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, while this matter has been discussed in the press, it is a matter which has never been considered by the committee. It is fundamental and of far-reaching effect. Certainly, some consideration should be given to an amendment of this importance.

However desirable a raise in the limits of insurance might be, this is certainly no way to adopt it. The departments ought to be considered and all the other questions involved should be carefully considered. It should be submitted to the committee and the committee should have a chance to study it. I ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should be defeated. For a good many years we have been considering the question of whether or not we should raise the coverage on the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to insure deposits up to $10,000. Of course, we have been thinking similarly about increasing it here. But this bill which we have before us is a very well-balanced bill. The provisions in respect to the liquidity of these associations has to be balanced against the possible and potential obligations. The potential or possible obligation at the present time is $5,000. In order to rebalance this bill, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, then surely we would have to review again this whole question of reserves.

At the present time the building and loan associations and Federal savings and loan associations have no legal reserves. This bill provides these legal reserves and these reserves are predicated on the fact that the first $5,000 of the deposits are insured. If we are to raise the insurance up to $10,000, then of course we have to give consideration to increasing the reserve requirements in order that those banks might be liquid or else you might create by doing so an unknown amount of responsibility and obligation on the part of the Federal Treasury and the Federal Government to at least morally take care of these accounts. I hope sometime our committee can get to that to give full consideration to whether we should increase the coverage on the FDIC to $10,000. I believe we can have reasonable assurance that if that is done, then certainly with justice to the savings and building-loan associations we might safely do the same thing for them. But we have to know what the coverage would cost. We have to know actuarily where we are going. To adopt it at the present time might throw this whole program so out of adjustment that the President might feel obligated to veto the bill the same as he did a previous bill.

We have in mind also that in this bill we retire the stock. We have just adopted an amendment which makes it mandatory and leaves little or no discretion with the Home Loan Bank Board as to the manner in which this stock shall be retired into the Treasury. All of these things have to be balanced off against this amendment. I hope the Committee will defeat the amendment with the positive assurance that the committee is sympathetic to it and at an opportune time, at a time when we feel it can possibly be done, it should be done as a whole job and not as a piecemeal job.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I refer the members of the Committee to a statement by Mr. Kreutz, executive manager of the National Savings and Loan League, on page 26 of the hearings, in which he states as follows:

The loss experience of the FSLIC has been favorable and compares very well with that of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. Using the latest available figures of both the FSLIC, we find that the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation's loss in receivership cases was $3.40 for $100 of assets of closed institutions, while the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's loss in receivership cases was $13.26 per $100 of deposits.

The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation's loss in contribution cases was $8.60 per $100 of assets, while the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's loss in mergers involving contributions or asset purchases was $2.51 per $100 of deposits of institutions in trouble.

The net losses of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation since its organization in 1934 amount to only 7.6 percent of its premium income and 4 percent of its gross income.

I agree with the gentleman from Michigan that it would upset the reserve picture, and I am happy that the gentleman from Tennessee has withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. FULTON. Since the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has raised the point that you might be raising the limit of the guaranties of general bank accounts from $5,000 to $10,000, and the committee might possibly be favorable to that, may I ask if you know that the number of accounts in banks now guaranteed in many of the large banks is up to 93 percent in number?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. The nearer you come to guaranteeing the total bank deposits of the country the nearer you are to a socialization of the banks and the nearer you are to Government management and ownership.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As long as the capital and reserves of the Corporation are raised by private subscription, which comes from the participating banks, there will be no danger. There is not any more danger than there is danger of socializing the life-insurance companies when the reserves of the life-insurance companies come from the payment of premiums. So long as we keep this on a voluntary, actuarial private-enterprise basis and private-capital basis, then there is not any danger of the socialization of this very important segment of our country, and I can assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will be watching for that just as much as he is.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan. It is hoped that before long the increasing of the limits of the insurance of banks and building and loan associations will be considered. We do not think that today is the proper time to embark on such a fundamental change in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TRIMBLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6743) to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, and title IV of the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. LYLE, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 457, Rept. No. 1572), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, with the Senate amendments thereto be, and the same is hereby, taken from the Speaker's table to the end that the Senate amendments be, and they are hereby, disagreed to and that the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be, and the same is hereby, agreed to.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill (H. R. 6743) amending the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

FAR EASTERN ECONOMIC AID ACT OF 1950

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (S. 2319) to promote world peace and the general welfare, national interest, and foreign policy of the United States by providing aid to the Republic of Korea.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DELANEY, from the Committee on Rules reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 458, Rept. No. 1573), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2319) to promote world peace and the general welfare, national interest, and foreign policy of the United States by providing aid to the Republic of Korea, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs now in the bill, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any of the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or committee substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

THE HOOVER COMMISSION REPORT ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, I have received many wires from veterans opposing that part of the Hoover Commission report involving veterans' legislation. Any change in the Veterans' Administration program of hospitalization must be viewed from the standpoint of better service to our disabled. The very proposal of the consolidation of hospital care for veterans with all other hospital programs of the Government is a complete reversal of our national policy of special treatment for veterans.

President Hoover himself in 1929 told us that increased efficiency and economy would be attained by the consolidation of all the different agencies dealing with veterans' affairs. Now the Hoover report recommends that we again take from the Veterans' Administration this most important function and transfer it to a new and tremendously large bureau to be called the United Medical Administration.

To me the most sacred duty of our Nation is the duty and privilege of providing for those who were disabled in the defense of our country. I believe this care can best be provided by the present agency, the Veterans' Administration, whose sole reason for existence is to provide to veterans the benefits to which they are entitled as set forth by the Congress.

I will support any worthy measure to increase the number and skill of doctors available to the Veterans' Administration. This would allow us to utilize the beds now vacant in our Veterans' Administration hospitals while many veterans need and merit hospitalization.

In the last session of this Congress I introduced H. R. 6150, which was designed to improve medical and dental services to veterans by permitting the Veterans' Administration to send its doctors and dentists to schools and hospitals to learn the newest techniques and discoveries.

I am opposed to transferring from the Veterans' Administration any of its duties or responsibilities to our disabled.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOEVEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mrs. BOSONE (at the request of Mr. GRANGER), for today, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. BLAND (at the request of Mr. SMITH of Virginia), for 1 week, on account of official business.

To Mr. BARING (at the request of Mr. RODINO), from 12 to 3 p. m. today, on account of official business.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, February 2, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, who in the toils and troubles of time hast set vistas of eternity in our hearts, we come in a high hour of human destiny solemnized by the tangled tragedy in which all our human life is caught. Help us in these trying days, rising above all that is base and small, to work together in glad and eager harmony for the honor, safety, and welfare of our Nation and of all the peoples of this stricken earth who will unite in mutual good will, determined to open the gates of a new life for all mankind.

Grant unto Thy erring and willful children moral control and a ruling passion for world brotherhood, lest the awful instruments of death and destruction now held in frail human hands scourge the planet and melt into brittle glass the fruitful earth. Make our lives as lighted windows of faith and hope amid the encircling gloom. In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. McMAHON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, February 1, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6743) to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, and title IV of the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 322. An act to transfer funds to the town of Craig, Alaska;

H. R. 746. An act for the relief of the legal guardian of August Michela, a minor;

H. R. 2585. An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide for exemption from duty of certain metallic impurities in tin ores and concentrates when such impurities are not recovered;

H. R. 4387. An act to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Treasury Department; and

H. R. 6212. An act to amend section 5 of the Federal Firearms Act.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. THYE was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate from February 3 through February 17.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FLANDERS was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate on Friday, February 3.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be absent from the sessions of the Senate commencing tomorrow and until the eighteenth day of February. I may say very frankly I am going to speak at certain Lincoln Day dinners. In addition to that, as a member of the Subcommittee on Federal Prisons, I plan to investigate certain prisons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. McMAHON, and by unanimous consent, a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

On request of Mr. O'MAHONEY, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs was authorized to sit this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. McMAHON obtained the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for an insertion in the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McMAHON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for an insertion in the RECORD, but I should like to get my speech under way as quickly as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Since the Senator from Connecticut has yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts, time might be saved if the Senator would yield now for the transaction of routine business.

Without objection, the Chair will recognize Senators for transaction of routine business, without the Senator from Connecticut losing the floor thereby.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred, as indicated:

REPORT ON CONTROL AND ERADICATION OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on cooperation of the United States with Mexico in the control and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease, for the month of December 1949 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORT ON EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN LANDS

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, that no exchanges of lands were consumated during the calendar year 1949, under the provisions of the act of June 14, 1926 (44 Stat. 741, 43 U. S. C. sec. 869); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS—WITHDRAWAL OF NAME

A letter from the Acting Attorney General, withdrawing the name of Piyoula Pantouli Ganat nee Piuoula Nicolas Pantouli from a report relating to aliens whose deportation was suspended more than 6 months ago, transmitted to the Senate on January 16, 1950; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi, condemning an alleged statement by Secretary of State Acheson on the Alger Hiss conviction, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See text of above resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. EASTLAND on January 31, 1950, p. 1146, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"House Concurrent Resolution 11

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to recognize the integrity of the States by enacting proper legislation to prevent Federal liquor licenses from being issued to any inhabitant of any State wherein the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited

"Whereas the State of Mississippi has indicated many times by vote of the electorate that it desires to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors; and

"Whereas the State of Mississippi has enacted and now has in effect laws accordingly; and

"Whereas the prohibition statutes are a proper exercise of the powers reserved to the States; and

"Whereas it is the duty of the Federal Government to recognize the integrity of States' rights in the proper exercise of their powers; and

"Whereas the sale of Federal liquor licenses to inhabitants of States wherein the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited clearly constitutes a violation of the sanctity of States' rights and impairs the States' efforts to enforce its laws: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi (the Senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to enact proper legislation to prevent Federal liquor licenses from being sold in any State wherein the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited.

"Resolved further, That the clerk of the house of representatives be directed to submit a copy of this resolution to each of the Senators and Congressmen representing Mississippi in Congress; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the presiding officers of the House of Congress and the United States Senate for reference to the proper committees thereof.

"Adopted by the house of representatives January 11, 1950.

"WALTER SILLERS,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Adopted by the senate, January 26, 1950.

"SAM LUMPKIN,
"President of the Senate."

EXCISE TAXES ON CAMERAS AND PHOTOGRAPHIC MATERIALS—JOINT RESOLUTION OF NEW YORK LEGISLATURE

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and printing in the RECORD a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New York, dealing with excise taxes on cameras and photographic materials. This is an important and vital industry in New York, where more than half of all the Nation's production of these items is concentrated. The Legislature of New York State has a viewpoint which will, I hope, be taken into consideration.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to repeal the excise tax on cameras and photographic materials

Whereas several industries in various parts of the country find that public consumption of certain articles and commodities has been reduced by reason of heavy Federal war-imposed excise taxes thereon; and

Whereas by reason thereof several industries have been forced to reduce production and lay off many of its employees; and

Whereas this condition has contributed and will materially contribute to the rising number of unemployed; and

Whereas unemployment leaves in its wake serious social and economic consequences and many who have been paying heavy war-imposed income taxes while employed, are transferred to relief and unemployment insurance rolls; and

Whereas during the war years the Federal war-imposed excise tax on cameras, photographic materials and equipment and on many other commodities was justified on the ground that it helped to discourage civilian consumption of such articles and commodities in order that they might be available to the war effort; and

Whereas there is no longer any justification for war-imposed excise tax on cameras and photographic materials and on many other commodities now subject to such tax; and

Whereas the camera and photographic industry and several other industries principally engaged in the production of articles which are subject to the Federal war-imposed excise tax find that by reason of the inability or unwillingness to pay such tax on such articles, the purchase and consumption of such articles has been greatly reduced and consequently these various industries have found it necessary to reduce production and discharge a substantial number of their employees, thereby adding to the unemployment load: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Legislature of the State of New York call upon the Congress of the United States to take immediate action to repeal the provisions of law imposing an excise tax on cameras and photographic materials and on various other commodities in order to encourage production in the various industries and to stimulate increased employment; and be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That copies of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Member of the Congress duly elected from the State of New York and that they be urged to devote themselves to the task of accomplishing the purpose of this resolution.

By order of the senate,

WILLIAM S. KING,
Secretary.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of assembly,

ANSLEY B. BORKOWSKI,
Clerk.

JANUARY 24, 1950.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXCISE TAXES ON TRANSPORTATION AND COMMUNICATION SERVICES—RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Public Service Commission of North Dakota, relating to the repeal of the excise taxes on transportation and communication services.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Federal excise taxes on transportation and communication services were initially levied or greatly increased during World War II, as war measures, to help defray war costs then current and also, in the case of the tax on transportation of persons, to discourage unnecessary travel; and

Whereas more than 4 years have elapsed since the end of the war, and the special and urgent needs for the levying or increasing of such taxes no longer exists; and

Whereas there has been a substantial reduction in railroad passenger traffic during the last 2 years, with resultant unprecedented deficits in passenger-service operations, approximating 430 and 560 million dollars in 1947 and 1948, so that the public interest now requires that common-carrrier travel be encouraged rather than discouraged; and

Whereas in view of the changed situation respecting passenger travel the excise tax on such travel has reached the point of diminishing returns, since the Government is probably losing about as much revenue through decreased Federal income-tax payments, due to deficits in passenger operations, as it is gaining in excise-tax payments on such service; and

Whereas all such taxes place an undue burden on the long-distance user of transportation and communication services, and on sections of the country far removed from centers of population, for the reason that the tax is calculated as a percentage of the transportation or communication charge; and is discriminatory against public transportation agencies which must collect the tax and in favor of private carriage which is not required to: Therefore be it

Resolved by the North Dakota Public Service Commission, That we urge Senators WILLIAM LANGER and MILTON R. YOUNG, Congressmen WILLIAM LEMKE and USHER L. BURDICK, to introduce or support measures in Congress to repeal all excise taxes levied on transportation by common carrier of persons or property and messages transmitted by communication-service companies.

C. W. MCDONNELL,
President.
ERNEST D. NELSON,
Commissioner.
ELMER W. CART,
Commissioner.

Attest:

ELMER OLSON, Secretary.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY AND NAVAL INSTALLATIONS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on Armed Services, reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill (S. 2440) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

ASSISTANCE TO COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to establish corporations to assist financial institutions in making credit available to commercial and industrial enterprises and to provide capital for such enterprises, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in full in the RECORD. I assume it will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Later in the day I shall address myself to the substance of the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2975) to establish corporations to assist financial institutions in making credit available to commercial and industrial enterprises and to provide capital for such enterprises, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 13b. 1. Purposes: The purposes of this section, in the light of which its provisions shall be construed and applied, are:

"(a) To foster competition in the growth and development of small and independent enterprises of economic and social value by providing intermediate and long-term credit and capital to small and independent business enterprises that are unable to obtain such capital from the usual banking or other financial sources on reasonable terms and conditions, where repayment or retirement of such credit or capital may reasonably be expected on the basis of prospective earnings, and a market exists for the products or services of such enterprises.

"(b) The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in cooperation with the Secretary of Commerce shall, in accordance with the provisions of this paragraph, determine the class or classes of small and independent business enterprises which are eligible for financial aid under this section. In determining whether an enterprise is a small or an independent business enterprise for the purposes of this section, there shall be considered the relative size and position of the business in relation to the trade or industry in which it is engaged, the size and nature of the area of its operation, the size and independence of the group supplying capital or holding ownership or control of the business, and the independence of its management; and no enterprise shall be considered to be a small or independent business enterprise which is affiliated through stock ownership or otherwise with any other enterprise in the same trade or industry which is determined to be dominant in the trade or business in which it is engaged.

"(c) To establish privately owned corporations within the Federal Reserve System, subject to the supervision of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, with authority to make loans and to provide capital to enterprises eligible therefor under the provisions of this section.

"(d) To encourage the growth of local industrial development corporations formed for the purpose of supplying venture capital for the development of new and useful products, services, or techniques by providing for limited financial participation in such corporations.

"2. Corporations authorized to make loans and invest in securities of small and independent business.

"(a) Corporations, not exceeding in number the total number of Federal Reserve banks and branches thereof, organized for the purpose of operating under this section, may be formed by any number of persons, but not less than five, and each of such persons shall be bona fide subscribers for shares in the corporation. Such persons shall enter into articles of association which shall specify the general terms and objects for which the corporation is formed and which may contain any other provisions not inconsistent with this section that the corporation may see fit to adopt for the regulation of its business and the conduct of its affairs.

"(b) Such articles of association shall be signed by all the persons intending to participate in the organization of the corporation and shall be forwarded to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System which shall file and preserve said articles in its office. Such articles of association shall specifically state:

"First. The name assumed by such corporation, which shall be subject to the approval of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

"Second. The place or places where its operations are to be carried on.

"Third. The place where its principal office is to be located, which shall be within the reserve district in which it is established.

"Fourth. The amount of its capital stock and the number and classes of shares into which the same shall be divided, all of which shares shall have equal voting rights.

"Fifth. The names and places of business or residence of the persons executing the articles of association and the number of shares to which each has subscribed.

"Sixth. The fact that the articles of association are made to enable the persons subscribing the same, and all other persons, firms, companies, and corporations, who or which may thereafter subscribe to or purchase shares of the capital stock of such corporation, to avail themselves of the provisions of this section.

"(c) The persons signing the articles of association shall duly acknowledge the execution thereof before a judge of some court of record or a notary public. Such articles shall be subject to approval by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System with the advice of the Secretary of Commerce. If the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System approves the articles of association, it shall issue a permit to begin business and the corporation shall thereafter become and be a body corporate, and, as such, and in the name designated therein, shall have power to adopt and use a corporate seal; to have succession for a period of 30 years unless sooner dissolved by the act of the shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock or by an act of Congress or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law; to make contracts; to sue and be sued, complain, and defend in any court of law or equity; to elect or appoint directors as provided in this section, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States; and, by its board of directors, to appoint such officers and employees as may be deemed proper, define their authority and duties, require bonds of them, and fix the penalty thereof, dismiss such officers or employees, or any thereof, at pleasure and appoint others to fill their places; to adopt bylaws regulating the manner in which its stock shall be transferred, its directors elected or appointed, its officers and employees appointed, its property transferred, and the privileges granted to it by law exercised and enjoyed; and shall have the other powers set forth in this section.

"(d) The board of directors of each corporation organized under this section shall consist of nine members, of which three shall be appointed from the public by the Federal Reserve bank of the district in which the corporation has its principal office, with the approval of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and six by the holders of the capital shares of the corporation authorized and issued under the provisions of this section, provided that the holders of each class of shares shall have the right to elect directors in proportion to the number of each such class of shares issued and outstanding to the total number of shares of all classes, but not less than one director shall be elected by each class of stock. Not more than one director of a Federal Reserve bank may also be a director of a corporation in which such bank is a shareholder.

"3. Capital-stock provisions—borrowing power.

"(a) Shares of stock in the corporation shall be eligible for purchase by member banks of the Federal Reserve System, and in order to facilitate the organization of corporations under this section, the Federal Reserve banks may purchase and hold such shares, as herein provided, until acquired by member banks. Each member bank is hereby authorized, notwithstanding any other provisions of law, to acquire and hold an amount of such shares equal to 1 percent of the capital and surplus of such member bank. Each Federal Reserve bank is hereby authorized, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to acquire and hold an amount of such shares not exceeding 1 percent of the aggregate of the capital and surplus of all of its member banks, but such Reserve bank shall, at the request of any member bank, and under regulations prescribed by the Governors of the Federal Reserve System, sell to such member bank the shares which the member bank is eligible to own, provided that no member bank shall own shares in more than one such corporation organized under this section.

"(b) Shares of stock in the corporation may be purchased by any nonmember bank, or by any financial institution, corporation, or individual, and the total number of shares which may be so purchased shall be determined by the corporation subject to the approval of the Governors of the Federal Reserve System, provided that no nonmember bank, financial institution, corporation, or individual shall at any time own shares in more than one such corporation organized under this section, nor more than 10 percent of the total outstanding shares of any such corporation.

"(c) Each corporation organized under this section shall have authority to borrow money and to issue its debentures, bonds, promissory notes, or other evidences of indebtedness under such general conditions as to security and such limitations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe, but in no event shall such corporation have liabilities outstanding at any one time exceeding the total amount of its paid in capital stock and surplus. Each member bank is hereby authorized, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to hold an amount of any debentures, bonds, promissory notes, or other evidences of indebtedness issued by the corporation under this section equal to 10 percent of the capital and surplus of such member bank.

"(d) No permit to begin business shall be issued by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to any corporation organized under this section unless the paid in capital and surplus of such corporation shall equal $1,000,000 or more.

"4. Insurance and investment authority.

"(a) Subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System may prescribe, and as provided in this paragraph:

"(1) The corporation may insure banks against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans to or purchases of obligations representing loans to small or independent business enterprises as defined in paragraph 1 (b) of this section and eligible therefor. In no case shall insurance underwritten by the corporation under this paragraph exceed 10 per centum of the total amount of such loans or purchases of an insured bank, nor shall such insurance exceed 95 per centum of the aggregate amount of loans to or obligations of any one small or independent business enterprise. In addition to such insurance conditions as the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the corporation, or both, may prescribe:

"(A) Not more than $10,000 of loans or obligations of one small-business enterprise may be insured;

"(B) No insured loan or obligation shall be for a period longer than 5 years;

"(C) The rate of insurance premium and the interest rate on insured loans or obligations shall be fixed by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System;

"(D) No audits or appraisals shall be required on insured loans or obligations but banks shall certify to the borrower's good personal and business reputation notwithstanding a lack of commercial assets, collateral, or security:

"(2) The corporation shall have authority to make loans with or without security to both small and independent business enterprises as defined in paragraph 1 (b) of this section, which are eligible therefor, or to purchase obligations of such enterprises, provided that applications for loans or purchases under this section shall be initiated through member banks or other banks or financial institutions cooperating with the corporation. Such loans or purchases may be made either directly or in cooperation with such banks or other lending institutions, through agreements to participate or by the purchase of participations, or otherwise, as the corporation may determine. Obligations acquired by the corporation under the provisions of this paragraph shall be for periods not exceeding 12 years, and no obligations maturing more than 12 years from the date of acquisition by the corporation may be acquired under this paragraph.

"(3) The corporation shall have authority to purchase common or preferred stocks, income bonds, or other capital shares of small and independent business eligible therefor under this section, provided that the amount invested by the corporation in such securities shall not exceed 20 percent of the combined capital and surplus and authorized indebtedness of the corporation:

"(4) The corporation shall have authority to purchase the capital shares of local industrial development corporations formed for the purpose of supplying venture capital for the introduction of new and useful products, services, or techniques, up to 5 percent of its capital and surplus.

"(b) The aggregate amount of obligations or securities acquired or for which commitments may be issued by the corporation under the provisions of this section which exceed the sum of $250,000 for any single enterprise eligible under the provisions of this section shall not exceed 25 percent of the combined capital and surplus and authorized indebtedness of the corporation.

"(c) The loans of any national banking association which are insured under this paragraph or which are purchased by the corporation or for which a commitment to purchase is issued hereunder shall not be subject to the limitations of section 24 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, purchases of loans, or commitments to purchase, shall not be subject to the limitations of section 5200 of the revised statutes as amended.

"5. Miscellaneous provisions.

"(a) The provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, as amended, shall not apply to any shares or obligations issued by the corporation nor to the issuance of shares or other capital subscriptions of any small or independent business enterprise which are acquired by the corporation under the provisions of this section, nor to transactions by any person in connection with any acquisition by the corporation of obligations or shares or any commitment to acquire them, nor subsequent to such acquisition, to any further sale, exchange, or other disposition by any person.

"(b) The corporation, its franchise, loans, and other assets, its capital stock, its surplus, its reserves, and its income, shall be exempt for a period of 15 years from the date of its charter from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or other taxing authority; except that any real property of the corporation shall be subject to State, Territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

"(c) Wherever possible the financing operations of the corporation shall be undertaken in cooperation with member banks of the Federal Reserve System or with other banks or financial institutions located where the applicant ordinarily carries on its business, and any initial investigation and servicing required for loans or purchases of securities by the corporation under the provisions of this section shall be handled through banks or other financial institutions on a fee basis.

"(d) The corporation shall make use, wherever possible, of the facilities of the Federal Reserve System, and of the Department of Commerce which are available for and useful to industrial and commercial businesses, and shall provide consulting and advising services on a fee basis, and shall have on its staff persons competent to provide such services. Subject to the supervision and direction of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System any Federal Reserve bank is authorized to act as a depository or fiscal agent for any corporation organized under this section. Every corporation organized under this section shall make annual reports of its operations to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System in such form as the Board of Governors shall prescribe.

"(e) Every agreement to insure or to make a loan to or purchase the obligation of a small or independent business enterprise eligible therefor under this section, and every agreement to purchase common or preferred stocks, income bonds, or other capital shares of such enterprises shall provide that any such loan or obligation shall become immediately due and payable, and that any such shares shall become immediately redeemable if such enterprise shall, by reason of the sale of its stock, or assets, or otherwise, fail to qualify as a small or independent business as defined in paragraph 1 hereof; and no financial aid shall be provided under this section which would lessen competition in any trade or industry."

Mr. O'MAHONEY subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day I introduced a bill to establish a system of private capital banks. The bill was introduced shortly after the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] made a very memorable address to the Senate on the terrible dilemma which faces the United States and the world with respect to the use of atomic energy.

As I listened to what the Senator from Connecticut had to say, it occurred to me that the very best answer the people of America could possibly make to the spirit of Russian aggression would be to make certain that the capitalistic system worked in the United States, and produced a high level of prosperity and a high level of employment.

By what we do here to stabilize the high standard of living which has been developed in the United States we shall, I believe, more effectively answer than by any use of force the acts of the Soviet Union.

We are accused of capitalistic imperialism, and there are in many areas of the world people who are susceptible to that sort of propaganda. The answer to the propaganda is to make clear that our system is not an imperialistic system, but is indeed a system of popular sovereignty in which the masses of the people may continue to prosper.

The bill which I introduced will in fact have that effect, because it is designed to promote the flow of private capital to meet the great needs of our expanding economy.

With private savings at record levels throughout the country, the private enterprise system is starving for lack of debt and equity capital. This was the burden of the testimony received by the Investment Subcommittee of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report during its recent hearings. Many opportunities throughout the United States for the establishment of new businesses are going begging for lack of venture capital, and even established businesses have found it difficult to obtain necessary term loans needed for successful operation. "Blue chip" stocks in national businesses have been selling far below their earning value while large financial institutions and insurance companies have not only provided equity capital but have not even provided the debt capital that small business needs.

Because existing financial institutions have not provided the method by which little and local and independent business can expand, more and more pressure has been built up for the use of Government funds. The bill I am introducing today seeks to avoid any new expansion of Government credit. It provides for no grants in aid, for no Government support. It calls for no appropriations. Its purpose is to establish the corporate machinery within the Federal Reserve System whereby the savings of the people may be channeled safely and profitably for investment in the independent business enterprises which must be fostered if a private enterprise economy is to be enabled to expand successfully and soundly, yet rapidly enough to maintain the present high levels of production and employment.

The bill I am introducing today is the outgrowth of a suggestion made to the Joint Economic Committee by Dr. A. D. H. Kaplan of the Brookings Institution. It amends the Federal Reserve Act to provide for the creation of capital bank corporations, not to exceed in number the 36 Federal Reserve banks and branches now in existence. The stock of these banks may be purchased by member banks of the Federal Reserve System and by nonmember banks, or by any financial institution, corporation, or individual, but in order to facilitate the organization of these corporations, the Federal Reserve banks are permitted to acquire and hold an amount of the capital stock not exceeding 1 percent of the aggregate capital and surplus of all the member banks.

The incentive for investment in the stock of the new capital banks is provided by exempting the earnings of the banks from taxation for a period of 15 years. Thus, during that period, taxes would be paid only upon the dividends to stockholders. It is so important in the national interest to provide the stimulus to investment in the private economy that this exemption seems to be highly desirable.

The new banks would have three primary functions: First, the authority to make loans; second, the authority to invest in the equity securities of existing business; and third, the authority to insure the loans of commercial banks against losses arising from loans to small or independent business enterprises or from purchases of obligations representing such loans.

Eligibility for insured loans would not extend for more than 5 years nor exceed $10,000 for one enterprise. Under this provision, character loans could be insured. The amount of the insurance premium and the interest rate to be paid on insured loans would be fixed by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

The banks would have the authority to purchase both common and preferred stocks, income bonds, and other capital shares of small and independent businesses, but the amount to be invested in such securities is limited to 20 percent of the combined capital and surplus and authorized indebtedness. Authority is granted to purchase the capital shares of local industrial development corporations not to exceed 5 percent of the capital and surplus.

It is recognized that large loans are essential to profitable operation. They are permitted; but loans of this character which exceed the sum of $250,000 for a single business shall not in the aggregate exceed 25 percent of the combined capital and surplus and authorized indebtedness of the corporation.

The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Secretary of Commerce are given the authority to define eligible small and independent business enterprises, but they are directed to take into consideration the relative size and position of a business in its trade or industry, the geographical area in which it operates, as well as the size and independence of the group supplying capital or holding ownership or control. Businesses which may be affiliated through stock ownership or otherwise—holding companies and the like—with any other business in the same industry are not to be regarded as eligible.

Each corporation is to have nine directors, of which three shall be appointed from the public by the Federal Reserve bank of the district in which it operates, but only with the approval of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The other six are to be holders of the capital stock of the corporation and elected by the stockholders.

It should be emphasized that these capital banks are strictly privately owned corporations. They are placed within the Federal Reserve System and are made subject to the supervision of the Board of Governors of that System. Individuals and institutions purchasing the stock would have the assurance, therefore, that they would be soundly administered. Through the authority to insure small loans, they would provide cooperation and support for the existing banking system. Through the authority to make term loans, they would be able to finance sound little and local enterprises which cannot now obtain working capital because so many local banks do not have sufficient capital to meet the demand. Through the authority to purchase equity stocks, they would be enabled to provide the venture capital now so necessary to bring about the development of existing business opportunities.

In the drafting of the bill every effort has been used to make the system really sound so that it will attract private capital. That the need for a freer flow of private capital exists throughout the country has been made evident not only by the testimony before the investment subcommittee but also by representations which have been made to the Department of Commerce by bankers as well as small-business men. The bill will be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and it is to be hoped that those who are interested in promoting and stabilizing the system of private property will come forward with any suggestions that may strengthen and improve the measure.

I am convinced that the present lack of investment capital results only from the fact that government has not provided the organization through which private capital may work to meet the demand. This bill is intended to provide that means.

Mr. President, I have prepared a summary of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF O'MAHONEY BILL TO MAKE PRIVATE CAPITAL AVAILABLE TO SMALL BUSINESS

This bill would establish capital banking corporations within the Federal Reserve System for the purpose of providing credit and equity capital to small and independent business. The facilities of the private-banking system of the United States and the capital of private banks would be used to meet the credit and capital requirements of the small- and independent-business man. No Federal appropriations guaranties or other forms of Federal financial systems are involved in this bill. The role of the Federal Government would be limited to that of ordinary supervision such as is usually exercised over banking institutions under existing laws. The bill is, in effect, a challenge to private banking and financial institutions to come forward and resume the traditional role of the local bank in financing small and independent local enterprise. As a result, it will be unnecessary for the Federal Government to expand its financing activities to provide this service which is vital to the continued growth and development of American free enterprise.

This bill takes the form of an amendment to the Federal Reserve Act and supplies a new section 13 (b) for the existing section that permits the Federal Reserve banks, under special circumstances, to make loans to business.

Paragraph 1 of the new section 13 (b) sets forth the purposes of the new section and provides standards for determining the class or classes of small, independent business enterprises eligible for financial aid under this section. The Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of Commerce are authorized to issue regulations defining such business on the basis of the standards set forth in this section. It is recognized that the definition of small business presents too many difficulties to permit a detailed description in the statute itself. Accordingly, some discretion must be left to administrative agencies competent to deal with the question.

Paragraph 2 permits the establishment of capital banking corporations within each Federal Reserve bank and Federal Reserve branch district. Thus, 36 such corporations could be organized in the United States. These corporations would have all the usual corporate powers of private corporations. Each corporation would have nine directors, three chosen from the members of the public by the Federal Reserve bank with the approval of the Board of Governors, and six chosen by the stockholders. Not more than one director of the Federal Reserve bank would also be a director of the capital bank corporation.

Section 3 of the bill sets forth the manner in which the capital banking corporation shall obtain its own capital. Member banks of the Federal Reserve System will be permitted to invest up to 1 percent of their capital and surplus in the stock of the corporation. Similarly, the Federal Reserve banks themselves will be permitted to invest up to 1 percent of the capital and surplus of all member banks in the district. When requested by any member bank, the Federal Reserve bank will sell its shares in the capital of the new corporation to the member banks. Shares in the capital banking corporation may also be purchased by nonmember banks or other financial institutions, as well as by individuals, but no institution or individual may own more than 10 percent of the stock of each corporation.

To provide additional capital for its financing operations, the capital banking operation may issue its debentures or bonds up to the amount of its paid-in capital and surplus.

Paragraph 4 of the new section sets forth the financing powers of the new corporation. These financing powers are: 1. The power to insure banks against losses from small loans not exceeding $10,000; 2. The power to make loans or buy the obligations of any small or independent business from banks or other lending institutions; and 3. The power to purchase equity, securities, or other capital shares of small or independent businesses. The additional authority is given the corporation to purchase shares of local industrial development corporations which specialize in supplying venture capital. But this authority is limited to 5 percent of the capital and surplus.

The lending authority of the corporation is designed primarily to assist small business, and therefore, the amount of the corporation's assets which can be invested in loans or security purchases which exceed $250,000 in amount is limited. It is recognized, of course, that authority to make some large loans is necessary to provide the corporation with a sound portfolio of investments.

In order to provide incentives for the establishment of such capital banking corporations, and their assets, capital stock surplus, reserves and income are permitted exemption from Federal taxes for a period of 15 years.

It is recognized that such capital banking corporations must be in a position to provide not only money but also business guidance to small and independent business. It is contemplated, therefore, that the Federal Reserve Board and the Department of Commerce will collaborate to establish machinery within which the capital banking corporations will be able to provide such service.

In order to make sure that the activities of the corporations are confined to stimulating small and independent business rather than the mere financing of successful enterprises which already play a dominant role in any trade or industry, the proposed bill provides that when a small or independent business ceases to be eligible for financial aid under the terms of this section, any loans or securities in the hands of the capital banking corporations shall be called or redeemed.

REPEAL OF CERTAIN TEMPORARY PROVISIONS OF AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1949

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to repeal certain temporary provisions of the Agricultural Act of 1949, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill and an explanation thereof be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the explanation presented by the Senator from Delaware will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2976) to repeal certain temporary provisions of the Agricultural Act of 1949, continuing high-level price support for basic agricultural commodities, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (d) of section 101 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (Public Law No. 439, 81st Cong.), and section 301 (a) (1) (G) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as added by subsection (c) of section 409 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, are hereby repealed.

The explanation of the bill presented by Mr. WILLIAMS is as follows:

EXPLANATION OF SENATOR WILLIAMS' BILL OF FEBRUARY 2, 1950, TO REPEAL CERTAIN TEMPORARY PROVISIONS OF THE AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1949, CONTINUING HIGH-LEVEL PRICE SUPPORT FOR BASIC AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Paragraph (1) of subsection (d) of section 101 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 provides price support at 90 percent of parity for the 1950 crop of any basic agricultural commodity, if marketing quotas or acreage allotments are in effect and marketing quotas have not been disapproved. Paragraph (2) of such subsection (d) provides price support at not less than 80 percent of parity for 1951 crops under the same circumstances. Repeal of these two paragraphs would make the sliding scales of support levels set out in subsections (a) and (b) of section 101 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 effective immediately. The support level for tobacco whenever marketing quotas are in effect would, of course, continue to be fixed at 90 percent of parity by subsection (c) of such section 101; and any price support levels announced by the Secretary prior to repeal of paragraphs (1) and (2) would not be affected by such repeal.

Under section 301 (a) (1) (G) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 the parity price for any basic agricultural commodity during the 4-year period begining January 1, 1950, would be computed under the old parity formula or the modernized parity formula, whichever results in the high parity price.

Repeal of this section would make the new parity formula applicable to all commodities immediately. It would not, of course, affect any support prices theretofore announced by the Secretary.

ELLEN KNAUFF

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill for the relief of Ellen Knauff. This is related to a case in which the Supreme Court decided by a vote of 4 to 3 that the claimant could be deported without ever having been given a hearing by the Department of Justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2979) for the relief of Ellen Knauff, introduced by Mr. LANGER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF LEASING OF POST OFFICE QUARTERS, DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. LANGER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 224), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to conduct a thorough study and investigation into the leasing of post office quarters in and around Detroit, Mich., with a view to determining whether any favoritism or other irregularity has occurred. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

CODIFICATION OF ARTICLES OF WAR, ETC.—AMENDMENTS

Mr. KEFAUVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4080) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. MORSE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the committee amendment to House bill 4080, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE—AMENDMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6073) to amend section 501 (b) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BENTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5472) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for navigation, flood control, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CAIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5472, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 6743) to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, and title IV of the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

DISPLACED PERSONS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SALTONSTALL

[Mr. SALTONSTALL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address on the subject of displaced persons broadcast by him over Station WSPR, Springfield, Mass., on January 22, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

ADDRESS BY SENATOR LEHMAN AT ROOSEVELT DAY DINNER

[Mr. HUMPHREY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Senator LEHMAN at the Roosevelt Day dinner sponsored by Americans for Democratic Action, at the Hotel Shoreham, Washington, D. C., on January 27, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

LIMIT ON MEDICAL STUDENTS—ARTICLE BY BENJAMIN FINE

[Mr. HUMPHREY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "College Heads Assail Doctors for Limit on Medical Students," written by Benjamin Fine and published in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of January 12, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

CAREER OF FULTON LEWIS, JR.—ARTICLES BY CHARLES VAN DEVANDER

[Mr. HUMPHREY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a series of three articles dealing with the career of Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr., written by Mr. Charles Van Devander and published in the New York Post on December 5, 6, and 7, 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

LIQUOR ADVERTISING IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE—STATEMENT OF REV. GERALD B. WINROD

[Mr. LANGER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement on the subject of liquor advertising in interstate commerce, prepared for presentation to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, by Rev. Gerald B. Winrod, of Wichita, Kans., which appears in the Appendix.]

THE FEDERAL DEFICIT—EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

[Mr. KEM asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Cause for Worry," published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE GENOCIDE TREATY

[Mr. TOBEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD two letters addressed to him and one addressed to the editor of the Union Leader, Manchester, N. H., in regard to the proposed genocide treaty, which appears in the Appendix.]

OPINION BY MARVIN JONES, CHIEF JUDGE, UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS, IN PEDERSEN AGAINST UNITED STATES

[Mr. TOBEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the opinion rendered by Hon. Marvin Jones, chief judge, United States Court of Claims, in the case of Pedersen against the United States, which appears in the Appendix.]

TITLE TO SUBMERGED LANDS

[Mr. O'CONOR asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter on the question of ownership of submerged lands within State boundaries, addressed by Walter R. Johnson, special counsel, National Association of Attorneys General, to A. A. Carmichael, attorney general of Alabama, which appears in the Appendix.]

MEDICAL ECONOMICS—EXCERPTS FROM ADDRESS BY DR. R. B. ROBINS

[Mr. O'CONOR asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from an address on medical economics delivered by Dr. R. B. Robins, of Camden, Ark., before the section on general practice, Southern Medical Association, on November 15, 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

A COWBOY'S VIEWS ON GOVERNMENT SPENDING

[Mr. MUNDT asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter on the subject of Government spending, written by a cowboy, "Neckyoke Jones," and published in the South Dakota Stockgrower magazine of the issue of November 1949, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE COAL SITUATION IN WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, owing to the seriousness of the coal situation in western Pennsylvania, and the permanent effect it may have on the coal industry, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a very timely editorial from the Washington (Pa.) Observer, entitled "Time Has Come To Save Coal Industry."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIME HAS COME TO SAVE COAL INDUSTRY

Officials of the United Mine Workers and representatives of the coal operators of the Nation are scheduled to meet Wednesday, in Washington in an effort to negotiate a new contract for the coal industry.

To one sitting on the sidelines, the time has come for two important steps to be taken.

1. One is to save the coal industry.

2. The second is to rehabilitate the earning capacities of the miners.

Both, of course, are interlocking. One cannot be accomplished without making the other possible. But both must be attained or this district will suffer a severe blow, one of the most serious in its history.

Markets have been lost in such large proportions since World War II that the economy of this district at least has been hit. Retail coal dealers report that they have lost about half their customers during the period.

Retail dealers supply coal for the most part for homes and institutions.

But turning to coal on the part of thousands as means of providing heat for homes is only part of the story.

Even railroads are discarding steam locomotives. They are turning to Diesels and electrically powered engines.

Industries, because of the uncertainty of coal production and costs, have turned to other fuels.

There will be uses for coal, many of them. But the cream is being skimmed off the top. These reductions in the uses of coal will be felt severely if there is a gradual decline in our economy in the years ahead, which can be anticipated and is already felt to some degree.

If the incomes of the miners are to be at a desirable level, it is imperative that coal retain all its present markets and add new ones wherever possible.

The time has come, therefore, when it would seem that the important thing to be accomplished from the viewpoint of the miner is stability of income.

Can this be accomplished by increasing costs?

Such a program does not mean that the miner, in view of other costs, should be called upon to make undue sacrifices.

Most miners we believe would be satisfied with present conditions if they could be assured of steadier work.

Steadiness of income for the miners should be foremost in the thoughts of the negotiators of the unions and operators.

Value of coal lands in this district, Washington and Greene Counties, are sure to be depressed.

Much of the income for support of the services afforded by political subdivisions, especially schools in numerous districts, comes from the coal industry.

A large percentage of the revenue of Washington County is collected from the coal industry. This source of income is being impaired. Real-estate valuations are being increased to provide more revenue.

If the coal industry were to become impaired to a greater degree, other sources of revenue would have to be devised.

Some municipalities have adopted a wage tax.

All things considered, it would seem therefore that welfare of Washington County calls for stabilization of income of the miners and of the industry as a whole.

The time has come for dreams of power and political considerations to be discarded to save the industry locally.

THE HYDROGEN BOMB — SUGGESTIONS FOR CONTROL OF SUPERWEAPONS

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, the President of the United States has now given orders to build the hydrogen bomb—to create, in deliverable quantities, those chunks of the sun technically known as thermonuclear weapons.

Mr. President, I should like to insert in the RECORD at this point the statement made by the President of the United States in making known his decision. I invite attention to the last sentence in that statement, wherein he said:

> We shall also continue to examine all those factors that affect our program for peace and this country's security.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> It is part of my responsibility as Commander in Chief of the armed forces to see to it that our country is able to defend itself against any possible aggressor. Accordingly, I have directed the Atomic Energy Commission to continue its work on all forms of atomic weapons, including the so-called hydrogen or superbomb. Like all other work in the field of atomic weapons, it is being and will be carried forward on a basis consistent with the over-all objectives of our program for peace and security.
> This we shall continue to do until a satisfactory plan for international control of atomic energy is achieved. We shall also continue to examine all those factors that affect our program for peace and this country's security.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, in line with the President's intention of continuing that examination, I shall make my remarks today with the hope that the thoughts which are expressed may be somewhat helpful in the situation.

The scientists feel more confident that this most horrible of armaments can be developed successfully than they felt in 1940 when the original atomic bomb was under consideration. The hydrogen development will be cheaper than its uranium forerunner. Theoretically, it is without limit in destructive capacity. A weapon made of such material would destroy any military or other target, including the largest city on earth.

The President's decision was dictated by the severe realities of the world which we inhabit today. He had no choice, and his decision under present circumstances is right.

American renunciation of the hydrogen bomb would mean embracing the folly of disarmament by example. Our friends abroad would shrink away from us, seeing that we had lost power to defend the United States, much less to help defend Europe. Kapitza, the great Soviet physicist, and German scientists imported into Russia are noted for their special competence in the technical problems relating to hydrogen weapons. Densely populated American cities are made to order for an explosive that will level hundreds of square miles. Communism suffered a defeat in prestige when our democracy completed the earliest atomic bombs, but this prestige defeat would be more than recouped, assuming that Russia were to complete hydrogen bombs soonest. Furthermore, if the Kremlin believes that it cannot outproduce us in ordinary atomic weapons—imagine calling the destroyers of Hiroshima and Nagasaki ordinary—its logical strategy is to excel in the thermonuclear field. All such factors as these serve to warn America against complacency.

Voluntary acceptance of the idea of being less well armed than other nations in this era of our greatest vulnerability runs completely counter to the traditions of our leaders—and, I might add, to good common sense. In my judgment, a failure to press ahead with the hydrogen bomb might mean unconditional surrender—in advance—by the United States to alien forces of evil.

But please note my insistence that we possess no monopoly upon the hydrogen-bomb idea. If we win the race to build this weapon first, it will be only a matter of time—and possibly a short time—before the Kremlin achieves success also. Let me warn, with all the solemnity at my command, that building hydrogen bombs does not promise positive security for the United States; it promises only the negative result of averting for a few months or years well-nigh certain catastrophe. Do not for a moment overlook the obvious—that Soviet Russia broke our atomic-bomb monopoly sooner than we had expected, and she would break any hydrogen-bomb monopoly we enjoyed with equal or greater speed. Mr. President, I have the idea that in discussing this subject we are dealing with something which is extremely important. We are plunged into a truly terrible arms race.

What are we going to do about it?

There are really, I suggest, no more than two broad policies from which to choose. One consists in resigning ourselves to a generation of waging the cold war—that is, striving endlessly to contain Russia's outward pressure, pouring out our substance to stay ahead in the weapons competition even after the Kremlin becomes armed with hydrogen bombs, and cherishing indefinitely the hope that Soviet tyranny will somehow see the evil of its ways and reform itself from within. Arrayed against the choice of such a policy is 5,000 years of recorded history, which teaches again and again and again that armaments races lead to war—under today's conditions, hydrogen war.

But even if this policy could enable us to avoid armed conflict for a whole generation, it would undermine and corrupt that which we prize more highly even than the absence of hostilities: I refer to liberty. How is it possible for free institutions to flourish or even to maintain themselves in a situation in which defenses, civil and military, must be ceaselessly poised to meet an attack that might incinerate 50,000,000 Americans—not in the space of an evening but in the space of minutes?

Consider what sustained fear does to the individual—especially to the individual enterpriser. It constricts his imagination, paralyzes his initiative, and even affects his personal morality. It constitutes the most subtle and potent of poisons. Consider the crushing burdens already imposed upon our private-enterprise economy. Consider, too, the restrictions on freedom already brought about by the atomic bomb and by its pressures upon us to accept loyalty checks, espionage counter measures, and widening areas of official secrecy. For a preview of the future if the armaments race continues, multiply the effect of these factors by something like 1,000 times—to allow for the 1,000-times greater energy release of the hydrogen bomb—and if you are candid and realistic, I believe you will find it is difficult indeed to see a dominant role for freedom in such a picture. To stay alive we will find ourselves more and more compelled to imitate the totalitarian rival.

The other broad policy which we may choose consists in moving heaven and earth to stop the atomic armaments race, to establish world-wide atomic peace, and to make possible atomic-created abundance among all men. In pursuing that policy we would tap to the roots the resources of our ingenuity and imagination; we would regard no suggestion as too startling or unconventional for careful consideration; and we would be guided, disciplined, and inspired by our code of ethics and democratic, peace-loving decencies.

It was from this kind of philosophy that we generated our original proposal for international control—a proposal which should constitute a source of pride to every citizen of our land. When the atom was split for destruction during the recent war, a transcendent moral problem came into being; and the responsibility for moral leadership on an equal order of magnitude rested upon us, since we had made the first bomb. There were those who advised us to advance no special or unusual peace plan, and who hewed to the same pseudo logic that now sees us waging the cold war for another generation. Fortunately, a wiser counsel prevailed and we rose to the moral challenge. We have written a page of history, Mr. President, that will live as long as history is read, and will reflect its glory upon those who formulated our program to serve God and mankind.

In essence we offered to share all that is good in atomic energy, and we asked only for the minimum safeguards, as operative upon ourselves as upon others, that would prevent the evil in atomic energy from being used to destroy us. We proposed that men of all countries, including Russians, come to America under the auspices of the United Nations and inspect our atomic activities and share in the control of our atomic raw materials and the operation of our atomic plants—all for the purpose of assuring themselves, to their own complete satisfaction, that we had honored our promise to exploit the atom for peace, and peace alone. Equally, we proposed that the same just and necessary protective measures be made effective throughout the globe.

More than 3½ years have elapsed since Bernard Baruch, as spokesman for the President of the United States, Harry S. Truman, presented our official plan to the United Nations. He delivered one of the greatest addresses known to the English language, saying:

> We are here to make a choice between the quick and the dead.
>
> That is our business.
> Behind the black portent of the new atomic age lies a hope which, seized upon with faith, can work our salvation. If we fail, then we have damned every man to be the slave of fear. Let us not deceive ourselves: We must elect world peace or world destruction.

We may as well bluntly recognize, here and now, that in the ledger of life and death, the ledger of world peace and world destruction, there is only one entry on the hopeful side: the study, the improvement, and finally the endorsement of the American proposal by an overwhelming majority of the United Nations. On the death side of the ledger, on the side of world destruction, there have been repeated entries—a succession which began when Mr. Gromyko, as the Soviet delegate, stated that our plan is unacceptable either in whole or in part. For the sake of confusing world opinion, the Kremlin has retreated somewhat from that statement, using phrases too vague to define; but basically Mr. Gromyko's words reflect the Soviet attitude as accurately today as when they were uttered.

It is my intense conviction that our decision, born of necessity, to build the hydrogen bomb must be accompanied by the immediate initiation of a moral crusade for peace having far greater potential effect than any physical weapon, even chunks of the sun.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Before the Senator leaves the point he has just mentioned, I should like to inquire whether it is correct that our offer of 3½ years ago, the plan of Mr. Baruch, is still just as good today as it was when it was made.

Mr. McMAHON. I say to the Senator that because it was objectively right, because it was based fundamentally on the scientific facts which are inherent in this problem, the American plan, which now has ceased to be the American plan and is the plan of the United Nations, is as objectively correct today in its essentials as it was on the day when it was formulated.

Mr. President, if we should fail in the business of working in a crusade for peace, we would deal a severe blow both to our moral position and to our fervent hopes for a secure future. The people of the United States want harmony among nations infinitely more than they want a new bomb. A fresh proposal for atomic peace, as dramatic as it is sincere, impresses me as urgently desirable.

Yet, through Bernard Baruch's immortal address of more than 3 years ago, we have already undertaken one major peace effort—and it was unsuccessful in that today we remain as far distant from atomic agreement as when we started. Why did this honest peace effort fail to impact successfully upon all mankind?

The answer is obvious and may be summarized in three words: Russia's iron curtain. The people of Russia, thanks to the iron curtain, have been prevented from knowing the true and desperate nature of the atomic crisis. They have been kept from learning, due to the iron curtain, how we extend toward them the hand of friendship and offer a just atomic control plan for their protection and incalculable benefit as well as our own. Any information on the subject that reaches the Russian people is first twisted and distorted into the red focus of the Kremlin's official line.

We all know why the Soviet elite members maintain their curtain. It is because, using Churchill's phrase, "they fear our friendship more than they fear our enmity." A prison cannot be operated with too many doors and windows unguarded and unlocked. The men of the Kremlin do not want us to look in. Above all, they do not want their own people to look out. This explains not only the Soviet clinging to the curtain but also the Soviet rejection of an atomic inspectorate and other essential controls.

It is completely accurate to say that, in final analysis, Russia's iron curtain is responsible for our enormously reluctant decision to make hydrogen bombs, for the curtain prevents the Russian people from appreciating that we want and seek atomic peace; they, therefore, bring no effective pressure upon their rulers to accept atomic peace; the rulers maintain their absolute sway through popular ignorance; and the atomic armaments race rushes madly onward.

But though we may justly blame the iron curtain, we must also blame ourselves for failing to bring our message of peace and conciliation adequately to the attention even of those peoples who enjoy reasonably free access to information. Few of our own leaders have recognized that global control of atomic energy is the heart question of all foreign policy and that the German dilemma, the Austrian treaty, the status of Japan, and like matters are relatively insignificant compared to the overriding issue of whether or not more atomic weapons shall enter into existence with each month and year which passes.

If a new crusade for peace is not to miss its objective, as did the peace effort which we launched with such high hopes in 1946, we must not only crack the iron curtain and gain the ear of the Russian people, but we must also gain the ear of people on the near side of the barrier, including the many in our own country who do not yet grasp what is at stake.

We have spent $29,000,000 a year on what we are pleased to call the Voice of America. It should be called the whisper of America. We spend in this country over $30,000,000 a year to advertise cosmetics, and $29,000,000, I repeat, to sell the most precious commodity we have to sell—freedom, itself.

All over the world today—perhaps because listlessness and mediocrity have characterized our attempts to sell what America is, what America wants, and what America intends—there exists misunderstanding as to our attitude. The 30 years of vilification emanating from behind the iron curtain in Moscow have taken a toll on our reputation as a peace-loving and a peace-living Nation. There are millions of people abroad who observe our armaments expenditures and fail to grasp that these are for self-defense.

They should appreciate the truth, but they do not. We assume that our actual good intentions and actual good feelings must be known to them; but they see that we devote billions to guns, tanks, planes, and atomic weapons—and day and night the Communist propaganda machine hammers into them the theme that American armaments are designed for conquest. Even worse, they do not see—at least with the same clarity—the huge resources being diverted to munitions inside Russia; for the iron curtain conceals such activity and even enables Mr. Vishinsky to deceive multitudes by claiming that his country uses atomic energy to move mountains.

I advocate, Mr. President, a United States program of attention-arresting foreign broadcasts that would compare in size and scope to the Soviet effort along this line and that would genuinely deserve the name, Voice of America. I favor exploring the efficacy of printing millions of leaflets for world-wide circulation, explaining a new United States proposal for atomic peace. We should publicly and repeatedly challenge the Kremlin to make known the terms of this proposal to newspaper readers and radio listeners inside Russia. We should publicly and repeatedly challenge the Kremlin to permit a meeting of the United Nations in Moscow itself, so that the trend of international discussions and our own sincerity would be more likely to enter the mental horizon of the average Russian.

There are other possible methods of creating a window in the iron curtain. Some have already been made known to the Senate; others will occur to us if we give the problem sufficient thought; all should receive the most painstaking scrutiny. At almost any cost we must assure that the Russian people have opportunity to consider, side by side, the atomic proposals of their own rulers and our atomic proposals, and that the Russian people act as part of the world jury which brings in a verdict covering this monumental issue.

There remains the question of what fresh atomic offer we should advance as means of igniting a moral crusade for peace. Recently some observers, quite properly conscious of the decisive position occupied by atomic energy, have argued that a board should be appointed, analagous to the one which prepared the famous American report in 1946, and that such a board shall take a new look at the entire control problem—especially with a view toward reevaluating the need for certain technical phases of what is now the United Nations plan. Yet the scientific facts surrounding the hydrogen bomb more than ever render necessary the general kind of technical program which the United Nations, after exhaustive study, has approved. More than ever it is true that an ineffective agreement would be worse than no agreement at all. More than ever there is no escape from strict control of raw materials, strict control of plants, and continuous inspection. We can enter into no scheme of a type which would only serve to mislead us and induce a false sense of security.

The new approach I have in mind is somewhat different. Although it flows from many weeks, and indeed months, of continuous reflection, I offer it only as an example of the bold steps which the Soviet atomic explosion, the shadow of the hydrogen bomb, and the pyramiding arms race should persuade us to consider.

We now spend about $15,000,000,000 annually for armaments. Why not offer to take two-thirds of this sum, or $10,000,000,000, and, instead of amassing sterile weapons, use it to foster peace throughout the world for a 5-year period? Why not offer to spread the annual $10,000,000,000 over three programs: President Truman's Point IV proposal, development of atomic energy everywhere for peace, and general economic aid and help to all countries, including Russia? Such a global Marshall plan might combine with the marvelous power of peacetime atomic energy to generate universal material progress and a universal cooperative spirit. In exchange for our own contribution of $10,000,000,000 annually, which we would save from the military budget, we would ask, first, general acceptance of an effective program for international control of atomic energy, and, second, an agreement by all countries, enforced through inspection, that two-thirds of their present spending upon armaments be devoted toward constructive ends. Administration of the annual $10,000,000,000 which we offered to make available for 5 years would be carried out through the United Nations.

Such a proposal, if advanced by our Government, might vividly bring home to all the world's population—in a manner far more successful than we have so far used—the profundity of our desire for peace. It would accomplish this result even if it accomplished nothing else. If the proposal were actually accepted, we would have concluded the cheapest monetary bargain in the history of the world; we would have probably saved mankind from destruction by fire; and we would have paved the way toward a new era of unimagined abundance for all men, based upon atomic energy constructively harnessed.

At present only one-third of the world's 2,200,000,000 people receive enough food to sustain life on a decent basis. The other two-thirds live continuously at the margin of starvation. Mr. President, it is atomic energy that opens up the vision of expanding material decencies until there is enough to go around for all, until every last hungry mouth is filled. Perhaps, through the expenditure of a few extra tens of millions of dollars we can conquer the riddle of photosynthesis and extract from the processes of plant growth a means of multiplying many times the world's food supply. Perhaps through atomic power for industry and agriculture we can transform the deserts of Africa, Asia, and the Americas into blooming crop-producing acres, and the arid hills of the world into gardens. It is almost impossible to overestimate what all-out concentration upon atomic energy for peace might accomplish in terms of remaking and improving the physical environment of mankind.

I might point out that we have already poured billions of dollars into foreign economic aid, asking nothing in return, and still Communist propaganda has blackened our motives in the eyes of millions of men. Here, in accordance with my suggestion, we would ask effective control of the atom and substantial disarmament—which every man and woman in the world has a right to expect without any further inducement on our part. Yet we would in fact provide further inducement, in the form of $10,000,000,000 annually for 5 years, as proof of our overwhelming will to peace.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

At the same time it goes without saying that we would provide no such funds unless they were associated with the measures needed to rescue humanity from hell on earth, control of the atom, and disarmament.

I suppose that my suggestions will be termed impractical or theoretical in some quarters. Before they are condemned, however, I would ask that whoever condemns them produce a better proposal.

I am willing to have my suggestions today judged against the background of Mr. Baruch's words spoken more than 3 years ago—words which I have quoted and which I now repeat:

> We are here to make a choice between the quick and the dead.
>
> That is our business.
> Behind the black portent of the new atomic age lies a hope which, seized upon with faith, can work our salvation. If we fail, then we have damned every man to be the slave of fear. Let us not deceive ourselves: We must elect world peace or world destruction.

Mr. President, I would write those words upon the heart and mind of every statesman in the world in the crisis in which we find ourselves today.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I have only a brief statement to make, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

This much, Mr. President, I would add: In 1945 and 1946, when our thoughts were focused upon the Hiroshima bomb, we enjoyed an opportunity to wage atomic peace that somehow, despite the magnificence and generosity of our proposal to the United Nations, we did not fully exploit. Our present concern with the hydrogen bomb furnishes a second opportunity. I do not think a third will be given us.

I believe that every morning each Member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, and each high official of the executive branch of this Government, should glance at the sun and reflect that what he sees there, millions of miles away, threatens to be recreated on this earth, in our own cities, in Washington, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and New Orleans. This is a time for soul-searching, for Nation-wide and world-wide debate, and for the launching and maintaining of that moral crusade for peace which alone can save us and lead mankind along the righteous paths of security, abundance, and liberty.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I wish to say to the very able Senator from Connecticut, who is the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Committee, that I think he has made a very great discussion of the subject on the floor of the Senate. For the purpose of clarifying the subject a little, I should like to ask one or two questions which I feel are entirely within the security surrounding this subject.

Does the Senator believe we can have adequate safeguards in the field of atomic energy unless there is a full inspection system established? I think the Senator has made that point in his remarks, but I should like to reemphasize it at this time.

Mr. McMAHON. No; we cannot have any security worthy of the name without a thoroughgoing inspection system. Of course, it was the realization of that fact which brought it into the proposal. I think it should be emphasized, for I should like to say to the Senator from California that when we made our proposals they were not based on political considerations; they were based upon scientific considerations; in other words, the minimum safeguards which would make the proposals work.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It is the Senator's viewpoint, is it not, that such inspection would have to cover both the field of so-called peaceful development of atomic energy and the field of weapon development? There have been some persons who have suggested that perhaps if we should permit inspection of one segment of the activity, that might suffice. Is it not the Senator's opinion that, because of the character of the subject with which we are dealing, there must be inspection from the raw material to the end product in all its processes?

Mr. McMAHON. I think the hyrdogen bomb only emphasizes and underwrites that necessity, for reasons which I would not go into at the moment, but which I know the Senator, being a member of the committee, can appreciate.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The second question which I should like to ask the Senator, if he will further yield——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'CONOR in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Assume for the moment that the Senator's proposal should be accepted by 99 percent of the nations of the earth, the one exception being the Soviet Union. Does the Senator believe it would be feasible in those cases to proceed to cut off $10,000,000,000 from the American defensive program for general distribution along the line the Senator has indicated, unless the Soviet Union itself should be a party to an agreement establishing adequate controls?

Mr. McMAHON. I think the Senator's question answers itself. I will say for the record, of course not. The only danger facing us today comes from the Soviet Union, which has refused during the past 3½ years to accept what all the rest of the other countries of the world HAS accepted. So, as I look at the world today, certainly from the point of view of an armed attack, it is only from the Soviet Union that such an attack could be envisaged.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator has concluded his remarks, but before he takes his seat I desire to express my deep appreciation of the sincerity and the courage with which he has discussed the great problem which was the subject of his address. There is no greater problem in the world than the armament race in which we are now engaged, and I myself wish to thank the Senator personally for the valuable contribution he is making to public understanding of the gravity of the issue.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. TAYLOR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield first to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Speaking only for myself, I wish to congratulate the Senator from Connecticut for the extraordinarily brilliant and moving address which he has just delivered, an address of the highest statesmanship, permeated by Christian principles, the very essence of the Christian religion. I hope we may all study this address very carefully and give it our prayerful consideration. I express my deep sense of personal gratitude for what the Senator has said, and the pride I have in being a humble Member of this body, associated with him in the work of the Senate.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator very much. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut on the statesmanlike address he has just made. In my opinion, if we had had more of this type of thinking beginning with the end of the war, and even before the end of the war, we might not be faced with the terrible dilemma which confronts us today.

I am hopeful that it is still not too late for something to be done. I feel that we have handicaps to overcome. The fact that the evil influence of Dillon, Read & Co. was largely responsible for shaping our foreign policy, and creating mistrust in many areas of the world, has placed us at a disadvantage; but I believe that with thinking in our country of the type just expressed in the splendid address of the Senator there is still hope.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, the Senator places me in a somewhat difficult position, because he has complimented me, I know most sincerely, for what I have said, yet I cannot let go unchallenged his assertion that the foreign policy of the United States has been written by any banking firm, be it Dillon, Read & Co. or any other firm.

Mr. President, I am rather proud of the foreign policy of the United States of the past 5 years, when I contrast it with the policy I have seen elsewhere of rushing nations into slavery, taking away their liberties, destroying their economy, suppressing freedom. I cannot help contrasting such a policy as that with the work of the United States in the past 5 years, when every time we have raised our hand it has been a hand bearing gifts, not only material gifts of bread, but also we have stood up, as I see it, for the cause of liberty.

It was not from Dillon, Read & Co. that the opposition came to the proposal that was made on June 14, 1946. It came from Mr. Gromyko, and I state to my friend the Senator from Idaho, as I said in my address, that the Russians have not deviated from the position they took at that time by one jot or one tittle.

Mr. President, it was with no effort to exacerbate the already strained relations between the Soviet Union and ourselves that I rose to make this address. We cannot tolerate without speaking up the attack which I feel has been made by the Senator from Idaho on the sincerity of our position, and which does not help the cause of peace.

Mr. President, I regret the necessity of saying what I have said. I want peace. I want peace as much as does anyone in the world. I want it for myself, for my family, for my country, and for the whole world, and I have thought a good deal about what it will mean if there is a rent in the fabric of peace. But I say that, even more than that, I want freedom, and I hope that those who have suppressed freedom, wherever they have gone and wherever they are, will at last realize that in the light of the threat which has now been projected over the horizon of the world, they cannot continue to proceed in the course they have pursued during the past 3½ years.

I am hopeful that if we shall adopt the proposal I have suggested here today, it may tip the balance. I know that the peoples of the world to whom the proposal reaches can never again be in any doubt as to who is the potential aggressor against the peace of the world.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. LEHMAN. I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and express my deep appreciation to the Senator from Connecticut for his constructive, humane, and spiritual remarks, which go to the heart of the matter now so much in our thoughts. I know of no subject which is more vital at the present time than the one which has just been discussed with so much wisdom and foresight by the Senator from Connecticut. His address was a great address, and a great public document.

I agree with the Senator that we have no choice but to protect ourselves against possible attack by all practicable, legitimate means, and because of that it is our responsibility and our duty to keep ourselves just as strong as we possibly can.

On the other hand, I commend with all my heart the suggestion made that we allow no opportunity to pass when it will be possible for us to appeal to the conscience of the world, including the conscience of the peoples behind the iron curtain.

I believe the suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut is one which should be given the closest, the deepest, the most sympathetic thought, in the hope that we can take steps which will assure our strong defense, and at the same time leave no stone unturned to bring about lasting peace and security throughout the world.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleague, the Senator from New York, in expressing deep appreciation to the senior Senator from Connecticut. Without taking time to express fully the practical import of the bold suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut, I nevertheless wish to say that I think he has thrown out a challenge to the conscience of mankind.

After the First World War the United States of America rejected the League of Nations and failed the hopes of the peoples of the world. After the second World War the Soviet Union has by its actions blocked peaceful international procedures in the United Nations, and the Soviet Union has failed the humane hopes of the peoples of the world. Whatever else comes of the bold proposal made by my distinguished colleague from Connecticut, I hope that it will give momentum to the movement to strengthen the United Nations by amendments to its Charter designed to abolish the veto, strengthen the World Court, widen the responsibility of the Assembly of the United Nations, and provide for an international police force to prevent aggression and enforce peace in the world.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. In asking the Senator to yield, I desire to state first that the question which I should like to ask him are not in any sense animated by any disagreement with the President's view that the hydrogen bomb should be developed. I am not at all contesting or denying the validity of the conclusion of the President.

I should like to have in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time, if the Senator will be kind enough to respond to my questions, something of the basis—not the scientific basis but the legal basis, if you please—on which the President acted. I therefore should like to ask the Senator a very few questions along this line.

In order that my point may be perfectly clear, I should like to preface it with the statement that I have observed in the press from day to day references to the fact that the decision as to whether we should develop the hydrogen bomb was going to be made by the President alone. I observed in the statement, made by the President of the United States, the responsibility which he found resting upon himself and the conclusion at which he arrived. I ask the Senator from Connecticut in the first place, whether he placed in the RECORD the short three-paragraph statement of the President?

Mr. McMAHON. I did at the commencement of my address.

Mr. DONNELL. I thank the Senator. I should like to ask the Senator what is his understanding as to the basis which induced the President to think it was his legal responsibility to make this decision?

Mr. McMAHON. In the act under which the Atomic Energy Commission operates it is provided that the President shall determine from time to time the number of atomic bombs which shall be made, and shall give his decision to the Commission once a year. The Senator from Missouri has a copy of the act in front of him.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator for the record whether he is referring to section 6, subsection 2, which, omitting some preliminary matter, reads as follows:

> The Commission is authorized to—
> 2. Engage in the production of atomic bombs, atomic-bomb parts, or other military weapons utilizing fissionable materials, except that such activities shall be carried on only to the extent that the express consent and direction of the President of the United States has been obtained, which consent and direction shall be obtained at least once each year.

Is that the section to which the Senator referred?

Mr. McMAHON. I should think that would cover it. I should also say to the Senator that, of course, I feel the decision was primarily up to the President. As to its implementation, of course, the Congress of the United States must exercise its powers by way of appropriations, if in no other way. But I feel that the decision primarily was one which the President had to make under the law.

Mr. DONNELL. And the law to which the Senator refers is the portion of section 6 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 which I just read. I assume that that would have been the basis of the President's decision. But I observe, with some considerable interest and some question, that the President, as I read his statement, does not base it on that section of the law, but bases it instead on the responsibility which he has as Commander in Chief of the armed forces. I read to the Senator from Connecticut for his comment this portion of the statement of the President as reported in the Washington Post yesterday. The President said:

> It is part of my responsibility as Commander in Chief of the armed forces to see to it that our country is able to defend itself against any possible aggressor. Accordingly—

If I may interpolate, I understand he is stating that by reason of this responsibility. I resume reading from the President's statement:

> Accordingly I have directed the Atomic Energy Commission to continue its work on all forms of atomic weapons, including the so-called hydrogen or superbomb.

And then, if I may complete the President's observation so that it will be before us in its entirety at this point, the President further said:

> Like all other work in the field of atomic weapons, it is being and will be carried forward on a basis consistent with the over-all objectives of our program for peace and security.
> This we shall continue to do until a satisfactory plan for international control of atomic energy is achieved. We shall also continue to examine all those factors that affect our program for peace and this country's security.

So, I ask the Senator from Connecticut, most respectfully, whether he does not agree with me that the President in making this fateful statement, as it is termed by the Washington Post, and doubtless by others, did not assign the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 as the basis of the legal duty cast upon him, but took the position that he was acting as Commander in Chief of the armed forces, and that it was in accordance with his responsibility as such Commander in Chief that he was making this determination. Does not the Senator agree that that is the language of the President?

Mr. McMAHON. I would say in answer to the Senator from Missouri that the President of the United States had a legal right to make the decision he did, and I am happy that he had that legal right, because there was a great necessity for the decision being made. I shall not now engage with the Senator in a constitutional argument as to the President's powers under his authority as Commander in Chief. I should like to point out to the Senator that probably his point is now made by calling attention to the language that was used. But certainly the Senator will agree with me that the important thing is that the President had the legal right to make the decision he did make.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. The query in my mind, which I shall mention in a moment, is along the line of whether the President has the power as Commander in Chief to make an ultimate decision of this kind independent of the action of Congress. Again, Mr. President, I may say, so there will be no misunderstanding on this proposition, that I am not disagreeing at all with the view taken by the President that the hydrogen bomb should be developed. But, as I understand the action taken by the President, as reported yesterday in the Washington Post, he did not purport to act by reason of the legal duty cast on him by the act of Congress, but upon what he considered to be his constitutional duty as Commander in Chief of the armed forces.

Mr. President, that leads me to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he does not agree with me, as he has already stated in substance he does, that ultimately the decision as to whether the expenditures, which may be vast, in carrying forward the hydrogen bomb program, are dependent upon action by Congress, and that the President has no legal or constitutional power to bind the Government, without the consent of the Congress, to the expenditure of such funds? Does not the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. McMAHON. I do not agree with that statement. I will say to the Senator that the President acted in his capacity as Commander in Chief, to whom additional powers were given by the law to which the Senator has referred. He was given powers in addition to his constitutional powers. Of course, the President of the United States cannot order anyone to make anything if the money is not available with which to make it. The Appropriations Committee will be considering the appropriations of the Atomic Energy Commission, and if the Congress of the United States should vote to cut off all funds for all atomic energy development and abolish the Atomic Energy Commission, I do not suppose there would be much the President could do about it.

On the other hand, he can order, and he has ordered, the Commission to go ahead to the limit of the money available for the purpose of research and development.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I have no doubt that under the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 the express consent and direction of the President must be obtained as a prerequisite to the authority of the Commission to engage in the production of military weapons utilizing fissionable materials. I should like to have noted in the record at this time, first, that in his statement the President did not say that he was relying upon this act of Congress. He based his action solely on his constitutional responsibility as Commander in Chief of the armed forces. Second, I should like the record to show that article I, section 9 of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

Article I, section 1, provides:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives;

Article IV, section 3, provides:

> The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Mr. President, I simply want the RECORD to show—and I am sure the Senator will have no objection—that, while I have no disagreement with the finding of the President that the hydrogen bomb should be developed, I wish to make it perfectly clear that the ultimate power of providing the funds, if any, with which to carry forward this project rests, under the Constitution, in the making of appropriations according to law; and that the legislative power of the Government is vested not in the executive department but in the Congress of the United States.

This leads me, Mr. President, to ask the Senator a final question, if I may.

Mr. McMAHON. Before the Senator asks the question will he permit me to make a statement?

Mr. DONNELL. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. McMAHON. As to the last part of the Senator's statement, relating to the power of Congress over the purse, I have no doubt about that, nor has anyone else who knows anything about the Constitution. But the Constitution does constitute the President of the United States as the Commander in Chief. To the Commander in Chief the Congress of the United States gave certain additional powers. What were those additional powers? To authorize the Atomic Energy Commission to make atomic weapons and to make them only under his orders. We delegated that power.

Mr. DONNELL. That is correct.

Mr. McMAHON. When the President has made his decision as Commander in Chief I cannot see the great relevancy of the fact that he did not say, "Under section 6A I have this right." That is implied in his statement. He acts in accordance with the law. I cannot see the Senator's point.

Mr. DONNELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I am sure that the announcement which appeared in the press to the effect that the decision as to whether or not we shall make hydrogen bombs will be made exclusively by the President, and that it will be made by him alone, was not couched in the official language of the President. At any rate, I am not undertaking to say that it was.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection in the world to the President's complying with the duties which are set forth in section 6 (a) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1949. I have twice previously stated that I am not disagreeing with his viewpoint that the hydrogen bomb should be made. I am disagreeing with one inference which might be drawn from the statement that the decision will be made exclusively by the President. I am disagreeing with any conclusion that Congress is without power in the premise, because, as the Senator has correctly observed in his reference to the power of the purse string, that power does rest in the Congress of the United States.

May I ask the Senator whether he is able at this time to enlighten the Senate as to the approximate amount of money which will be required to carry on this program?

First I should like to refer to an interesting article by Alfred Friendly, published in the Washington Post yesterday. I should like to read a short excerpt from the article:

> The first published estimates of the probable cost, unofficial and only guesses based on undisclosed evidence, indicated an expense of from two to four billion dollars.

Mr. Friendly, the writer of the article, does not concur with that estimate. He says:

> This reporter believes, from current information, that Urey's estimate is too low. But he also believes it is far closer to reality than the two- to four-billion-dollar guess.
> As a working hypothesis, it seems safe to take a figure of cost as a few hundred million dollars.

Will the Senator be kind enough to tell us, if he is at liberty to do so, and if he can, what is the best available estimate at this time as to the expense which we may look forward to being confronted with in the development of this weapon, at least so far as the initial expense is concerned.

Mr. McMAHON. I do not feel that I can go into those figures today with the Senator. The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, in executive session, has received some estimates as to the cost, both of development and production. I wish the Senator would "let me off," as the saying goes, from answering that question today.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to do so. I greatly appreciate the courtesy of the Senator and his frank responses.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It might be added that to disclose such figures may give an indication of the method to be pursued in the making of the bomb or bombs. Perhaps for that reason, if not for others, there is some need at the present time for keeping the matter restricted.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator very much. Perhaps he has better satisfied the Senator from Missouri than I have, although I am sure that the Senator from Missouri took my word for it.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, because I was momentarily engaged in conversation with another Senator, I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Colorado. Would he oblige me by repeating it?

Mr. MILLIKIN. If the Senator missed some of my pearls of wisdom, I shall be very glad to repeat them. I believe that at this time a disclosure of the amount of money required for this project could have the effect of disclosing the way in which we intend to proceed to make the bomb. Therefore, I believe there is some reason at this time for preserving some reticence on the subject.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I can readily appreciate the point. I understood the Senator from Connecticut to say that in his opinion the matter of appropriations would soon be before the Senate. Am I correct in that?

Mr. McMAHON. The hearings on appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission began in the House of Representatives about 2 or 3 days ago, in executive session.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator contemplate that the subject matter will be before Congress within a few weeks?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I wish to observe that I think it is very timely that the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, who probably knows more about the implications of atomic energy and the development of the bomb than does any other Member of Congress, should make this statement and give his viewpoint to Members of Congress and to the Nation. I feel that the proposal of the distinguished Senator deserves a great deal of consideration. I am glad that statesmen and deep thinkers like the Senator from Connecticut are considering additional ways and means by which we can exercise our position of leadership in the cause of peace.

I was very much impressed this morning, as I know the distinguished Senator was, with a cartoon by Herblock in the Washington Post, in which the ugly finger of the hydrogen bomb is shown pointing at a man carrying a brief case bearing the inscription "Democratic statesmanship," and the title of the cartoon is 'One of Us Is Going To Settle Things for a Long Time."

It is encouraging to see the Chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy taking the lead in trying to find ways to settle these problems by democratic statesmanship.

As the distinguished Senator from Connecticut knows, many of us have had the feeling that we should try to explore other lines of bringing the free people of the North Atlantic together in the interest of peace and security so that we can have more nearly an Atlantic Union than is provided by the Atlantic Pact. I hope the distinguished Senator from Connecticut feels that these proposals are worth exploring. In view of the fact that about 50 Members of the Senate of the United States have expressed, by the sponsorship of either the Atlantic Union proposal, the United World Federalist, or some of the other proposals, their unwillingness to rely upon the Atlantic Pact, a military pact, as an element of our foreign policy, I hope the distinguished Senator from Connecticut will help us to obtain consideration and action by the Senate upon some of these proposals.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator. I am on the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, which began this morning hearings on the various proposals which have been made. When the Atlantic Union proposal comes before the subcommittee for consideration—which will be on Friday, I believe—I hope the Senator will appear before the subcommittee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. I should like to associate myself with what has been said in the address with which the Senate has been favored today by the Senator from Connecticut. It seems to me very heartening that the Senator should take pains to illuminate the subject at the present time, when all the people of our country are interested in it, and to give all the information he feels he is at liberty to give about the progress and purpose of the decision which has been reached by the President. I think there is no one better able, both in actual capacity and in the position he holds, to render that service to the people at the present time.

I know that the distinguished Senator from Missouri has indicated all the points of criticism he could find or which could be found by anyone in the address of the Senator from Connecticut, but I could not follow his criticism of the language the President used in announcing his decision. Apparently it was that the President did not give the proper source of the authority under which he issued the statement. The Senator said the President has certain constitutional authority and that other authority is given him by special legislation enacted by the Congress. Why the President should refer to the special legislation, in his statement, any more than he should refer to the Constitution of the United States as the source of his authority, I fail to understand.

However, if that is the only criticism which can be leveled at the substance of the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut, I think he is to be congratulated, because the Senators of the United States have an infinite capacity for pointing out holes in anyone's argument or lapses in correctness of expression.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE BUDGET AND EXPENDITURES FOR WAR

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, during my visit home during the recess, I had occasion to contact many of the people of my State in regard to the very perplexing question of taxes and a balanced budget. On many of those occasions, I pointed out that the real problem of balancing the budget and the real problem of taxation in the United States rest not so much with governmental functions as such, not so much with criticism of what have loosely been termed "welfare measures," but with the great amount of money we spend for the stupid business called war, a business which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON] touched on today, by which he did a great service to the American people and to the Congress.

Approximately 73 percent of the present budget is for war or for things which have been caused by war or its adjuncts. In view of that situation, it seems to me that when we talk about balancing budgets, when we talk about taxation, when we talk about cleaning our financial house, probably we had better go to the corner where the dust is piled the highest.

Mr. President, along those lines, I present and ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, an excellent editorial entitled "The Warfare State—Not the Welfare State," published in the Progressive.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WARFARE STATE

The President's 1950–51 budget, second highest in the Nation's peacetime history, drew howls of protest from the conservative press and politicians. The $42,000,000,000 budget, and its $5,000,000,000 deficit, were blasted as "the bankrupting cost of the welfare state" and as "laying the bricks on the Socialist road to economic ruin."

Analysis of the budget shows how weirdly inaccurate such charges are. Nearly three-quarters of the budget's forty-two billions—72.4 percent to be exact—is earmarked for war, whether for past war, the present cold war, or preparation for future wars.

Item-by-item break-down of the recommended expenditures reveals that of every dollar of expenditure provided in the budget:

Thirty-one and nine-tenths cents will go directly for national defense.

Thirteen and two-tenths cents will pay interest on the national debt, most of it incurred in the two World Wars.

Fourteen and three-tenths cents will be disbursed in the form of veterans' benefits.

Eleven and one-tenth cents will be paid in international security grants to foreign nations.

One and nine-tenths cents are earmarked for atomic-energy development.

The total of these war and defense appropriations is 72.4 cents out of every dollar of Federal spending.

Conversely, the total of all Government activities which could be classified as welfare or social-service programs comes to 18.8 cents, of which aid to the aged, the blind, and the otherwise handicapped comes to 3.6 cents; other social-welfare and health services, 2.8 cents; purchase of housing mortgages, 2.3 cents; housing and slum clearance, 1 cent; aid to agriculture, 3.6 cents; rural electrification and rural housing, 1.6 cents; and subsidies to business, 3.9 cents.

Significantly, the last item is the largest but, of course, provokes the least outcry. These subsidies go to newspapers and magazines, the merchant marine, and air lines, all privately owned and operated for private profit.

We shall be watching with great interest when the economy bloc goes into action. We have no doubt that there is waste in the Federal establishment and that sound economies can be made without disturbing vital functions of the Government. But we're convinced that any genuine effort at economy must be made with the understanding that the budget finances a warfare state, not a welfare state.

CODIFICATION OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4080) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the consideration of House bill 4080, the unfinished business, and the debate on it, Mr. Felix Larkin and Mr. Robert Hadock may sit with me on the floor of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REDUCTION IN AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES PRICE SUPPORTS

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, yesterday the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, appeared before the Senate Agriculture Committee seeking its advice as to what action it would recommend the Department of Agriculture take in disposing of the 50,000,000 bushels of surplus potatoes. Mr. Brannan gave the committee two alternatives, namely—

First. To destroy them, which would mean the greatest willful destruction of food by any government in recorded history.

Second. To spend an additional $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 and (a) pay the freight and give them away to school lunch programs that cannot afford the cost of transporting them, and (b) give some away for industrial use.

What Mr. Brannan failed to emphasize to the committee yesterday was the fact that this 50,000,000 bushels of potatoes represents but a small percentage of the $3,500,000,000 worth of surplus commodities which the Department of Agriculture now has on hand. For instance, the inventory records on January 1, 1950, disclosed that they had on hand at that time commodities valued at a total of $3,645,129,317.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a table showing the inventories of the Commodity Credit Corporation as of January 1, 1950.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tobacco, 367,258,290 pounds	$151,891,629
Cotton, 6,036,588 bales	955,109,372
Wheat, 465,226,944 bushels	996,719,026
Linseed oil, 394,827,620 pounds	111,337,600
Flaxseed, 13,943,222 bushels	88,344,527
Corn, 510,654,685 bushels	713,128,735
Dried eggs, 69,036,207 pounds (210,000,000 dozen)	89,317,233
Butter, 96,260,088 pounds	59,518,797
Wool, 69,403,900 pounds	53,510,467
Dry edible beans, 4,850,795 hundredweight	42,859,926
Barley, 24,626,019 bushels	35,088,096
Dried milk, 215,799,300 pounds	27,399,460
Other	320,904,449
Total	3,645,129,317

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the day is rapidly approaching when the Department of Agriculture is going to be confronted with a similar proposal of wholesale destruction of all these commodities. To complicate the situation further, the House yesterday passed a bill to add to this year's cotton crop from one to two million acres, and at the same time added an unspecified number of acres to this year's peanut acreage. The cotton and peanut farmers were assisted in this action by representatives of the wheat and corn areas, apparently with an understanding that their request, expected at a later date, for increased acreage on both wheat and corn will be supported by the cotton and peanut representatives. This action was taken notwithstanding the fact that today the Government already has on hand nearly $1,000,000,000 worth of cotton and nearly 75,000,000 pounds of peanuts.

It does not make sense for the Secretary of Agriculture to express concern over the situation with which he is now confronted, in that he apparently feels it necessary to recommend wholesale destruction of the commodities. The program of high, excessive support prices was enacted into law with the full support of the Secretary of Agriculture and the administration. The only criticism of the Anderson law which I heard from the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Brannan, at the time of its consideration, was that the support prices were not high enough.

The proposal of the Secretary of Agriculture to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was to the effect that we are confronted with two alternatives. One was, not only to give away the commodities, but the Secretary actually suggested paying additional money of the taxpayers in order to get the industrial users and exporters to take the excess commodities. The second proposal was to launch the greatest wholesale destruction of food the world has ever known. I disagree completely with the position taken by Mr. Brannan and the administration, that we are forced to make such a choice.

There is another alternative, one which will not only remove the necessity of wholesale destruction of food but also will save the taxpayers billions of dollars. In the long run, the American farmer will benefit from this proposal, because he will have a more realistic agricultural program. In my opinion, the only alternative we have is the immediate repeal of the existing 90-percent support for so-called basic commodities, accompanied by an immediate lowering of the support price of the nonmandatory commodities, which include potatoes.

My proposal is that Congress amend the Anderson Act as passed by the Eighty-first Congress by repealing, effective immediately, the 90-percent guaranty on the basic commodities and also by advancing the effective date of the flexible provisions of the act from January 1, 1952, to read effective immediately.

With that thought in mind, I am sending to the desk a bill and ask for its reference to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I urge that the Senate Agriculture Committee and the Congress give serious consideration to enacting this bill as a substitute for S. 2826, which is the bill under which the Secretary of Agriculture is asking an additional $2,000,000,000 authority.

The passage of the substitute bill would automatically provide for lower support prices for the crop year 1950 and would thereby eliminate the necessity of Congress approving the addition $2,000,000,000 requested under S. 2826. The savings under this bill, through the provision for lower support prices, would go far toward reducing the anticipated deficit of the Government for the next fiscal year.

The passage of the bill would eliminate many of the inequities now existing under the present law, through which one segment of our agriculture is being supported at artificially high levels, while in the East another group of farmers who are not being subsidized and who are buyers of the supported grains as commercial feeds, are being seriously penalized.

The passage of this bill would serve as a direct benefit to the American housewife, who would be able to purchase at lower prices some of the vast quantities of agricultural products which now are either being destroyed or withheld from the market.

The lower prices of food products would increase consumption and thus make it possible to reduce the heavy inventories through normal channels of trade, instead of the current suggestion of the Secretary of Agriculture of the wholesale destruction of good edible foods.

Repeal of the artificially high support prices at this time would prove in the long run to be of decided benefit to the western farmer. It would remove much of the adverse criticism which the farm program in general is getting from both consumer and taxpayer.

The passage of the bill would still leave a support program under most agricultural products higher than the level which the western farmer had been told to expect after the war period was over.

By advancing the date of the flexible support formula, it is estimated there would be a reduction in commercial dairy and poultry feed of from $15 to $20 per ton. This reduction in commercial feed costs is essential if we are to save two great farming industries in the East, namely, the dairy and the poultry industry, from inevitable bankruptcy. It is sheer folly to continue the policy of aiding one segment of agriculture by destroying another.

The eastern poultry farmers are confronted today with a situation which will force them out of business or into bankruptcy, due to the existing artificially high costs for commercial feeds resulting directly from the Government's high support program.

The eastern dairy farmer is just beginning to feel the pinch. He will in the near future be confronted with a situation comparable to that which exists today in the poultry industry, unless steps are taken in the immediate future to eliminate inequities under the existing farm price-support law.

The enactment of my bill would eliminate the necessity of Congress' granting the request of the Secretary of Agriculture for another $2,000,000,000 borrowing authority. This does not mean it would result in a net saving to American taxpayers of the full $2,000,000,000. However, it would unquestionably result in reducing the over-all cost of the agricultural program for the current fiscal year by at least 50 percent and it would stop the senseless destruction of food.

It would automatically eliminate the necessity for the adoption of strict acreage and production controls, in that the lower support price would remove much of the incentive for continued high production.

I recognize that the farm-subsidy program is only one of the many subsidies which are today in effect. Most of the subsidies are hang-overs of World War II. I think the time has come when the Congress should take affirmative steps toward a systematic reduction of all existing subsidies, both in industry and in agriculture.

The proposal of reducing and working toward a gradual elimination of Government subsidies is the most important constructive step which can be made toward achieving a worth-while reduction in our existing high cost of government.

The best form of Federal aid for the American farmer, or any other group, is a substantial reduction in the cost of Government, accompanied by a reduction in taxes.

I therefore urge that the Members of Congress join me in supporting the bill. Let us put a stop to the senseless and extravagant policy of destroying good, edible foods. At the same time, I urge them to join with me in removing American farmers from the political auction block.

Mr. WILLIAMS subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a chart showing the existing support prices for the average of the 10-year period, and also a comparison of the existing prices with the average prices for the 10-year period.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am sorry I did not hear more of the statement of the Senator from Delaware, but I am told he referred to potatoes, which is of course a matter very near my heart and one which is also vital to the interests of my State. I think this may be an appropriate opportunity to make clear in the RECORD what has developed with regard to the potato program during the past year.

We continually read in the press statements of the cost of the 1948 potato program. It was carried out under the terms of the 90-percent program, which was enacted into law during the war. As a result, 450,000,000 bushels of potatoes were produced in that year, and it cost the Government $225,000,000 to remove and to convert the excess potatoes, a figure which is constantly reiterated in the press. Both figures are accurate; there is no dispute regarding them. However, the critics of the policy, both in and outside the press, always seem to consider it unimportant to state that those interested in the potato crop were the ones who themselves not only proposed but urged that the support price for potatoes be reduced in the crop year 1949. That was the only major crop, on which such action was proposed.

I am happy that the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] is present, so that if I make an inaccurate statement, I am sure he can correct me. The potato crop for 1949, under the decision of the Secretary of Agriculture, in the exercise of his authority given in the law, was fixed as 60 percent of parity. The figure 60 percent was reached by the potato growers of my own State and by potato growers throughout the country representing the National Potato Council, feeling that figure would be an assurance against the producers of potatoes facing again the tragic situation of the 1930's when potatoes were priced at 10 cents a bushel, and millions of bushels of them were dumped on the ground by the producers, as a total loss. It was felt that it would be a guaranty against a tragic situation of that character, and that, at the same time, it would tend to remove the marginal producers and would also discourage greater production for profit.

I very much doubt whether there are many places in the United States where potatoes can be produced at a profit, on 60 percent of parity. At any rate, that was the concept under which that floor was placed.

During the crop-year period of 1949, it has been estimated that the expense of the removal may run between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000. That certainly is very encouraging as compared with the previous year. It is the result of a crop production of approximately 400,000,000 bushels as against 450,000,000 bushels the previous year. In other words, the potato growers, in cooperation with the Department's allocation of acreage, have reduced their production by 50,000,000 bushels, somewhat more than 10 percent of the total crop. There are still more potatoes than the Nation is consuming at the present time. It is admitted now that the annual consumption of potatoes, in normal channels, is approximately 335,000,000 bushels. That figure is interesting as the basis of the program for the coming year. The program in the past year was supposed to produce 350,000,000 bushels, but it actually produced 400,000,000 bushels.

In justice to the State of Maine, I want to have it clear that we reduced our production by 10 percent, from approximately 73,000,000 bushels to 67,000,000 bushels, through the reduction in acreage which was requested. But I think it will be found that in the State of Maine there was a higher percentage of what are called cooperators than in any other State of the Union. There was approximately 80- to 90-percent cooperation, although cooperation meant simply limiting the number of acres planted and it was true that by increased fertilization and planting potatoes nearer together—not in the row, as has been so commonly stated, but planting the potatoes 6 inches apart instead of 9 inches apart—more potatoes were produced per acre, rising to an average of nearly 900 bushels per acre, which was a record production.

The tragedy of it was that our neighbors immediately across the line, in New Brunswick increased their potato production by 10 percent, as the result of finding that last year they could send nearly 10,000,000 bushels of potatoes into this country. There is now a surplus in the Maritime Provinces which will enable them to send to the United States between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000 bushels this year.

In part that situation is due to the reduced tariff provided in the trade agreement, and in part it is due to Canada's lower cost of production as a result of her different standards of living and wage scales.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPARKMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BREWSTER. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to state to the Senator from Maine that my criticism is not wholly against the potato program. Fifty million bushels of potatoes, while constituting a huge amount, represents only a small part of the large inventories of agricultural commodities which are now on hand. These heavy inventories will bring about such a situation, in the very near future, that we shall have to destroy these other commodities or give them away.

Only recently I received in my office from the Department of Agriculture a bulletin which pointed out that there had been imported during the past 11 months more than 5,000,000 bags of potatoes from Canada. This represents over 10,000 carloads of Canadian potatoes which were shipped into this country and sold on our markets to the American housewives. At the same time, and in the same mail, there was a notice to the effect that we are offering to sell potatoes for export only at 1 cent per hundredweight, which simply does not make sense——

Mr. BREWSTER. I can assure the Senator from Delaware that every intelligent citizen of Maine, and that comprises almost our entire citizenship, is opposed to permitting this situation to continue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator from Maine that the farmers themselves were not the ones who encouraged this program. The potato farmers advocated, long before the Department of Agriculture did, a lower support price. The support price which is in effect today, is directly the responsibility of the Secretary of Agriculture himself. His only criticism of the Aiken bill or the Anderson bill, so far as I ever heard, was that the support price was not sufficiently high.

Today, under his utopian plan, he promises the farmers more money and at the same time promises the housewife lower prices, all without costing the taxpayers any additional expense. Any sixth-grade child can tell you that just cannot be done.

Mr. BREWSTER. Answering the Senator's first statement, I am very grateful that the Senator has pointed out that comparatively insignificant sums are involved. While $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 is not insignificant in Maine, it is insignificant when we contemplate the gigantic amounts involved in the entire program. I asked the Secretary of Agriculture concerning it when he was before the committee, and, to my surprise, when I asked him about the amounts involved, not only the $3,000,000,000 now embarked in the Commodity Credit Corporation program and the $2,000,000,000 in addition which is requested, he also used the figure of $7,000,000,000. Perhaps the Senator from Vermont can clarify that. What it represents, I do not know.

Mr. AIKEN. The $2,000,000,000 included the major amount contemplated for the support of the 1950 crops.

Mr. BREWSTER. What is the $7,000,000,000 figure?

Mr. AIKEN. That is $4,750,000,000 which already had been made available to the Commodity Credit Corporation, plus the $2,000,000,000 which has been requested, making nearly $7,000,000,000. The Secretary was evidently using approximate figures.

Mr. BREWSTER. Can the Senator from Vermont tell me what would be the situation if we looked at it as a banking proposition, as to the value of the existing purchases of the Commodity Credit Corporation, if they were valued at the current market prices?

Mr. AIKEN. That is very difficult to tell.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. It depends upon whether we are going to value potatoes at $3.50 a bag or at 1 cent a bag.

Mr. BREWSTER. I presume we would use the domestic price.

Mr. KEM. Apparently it is impossible to dispose of them at the domestic price.

Mr. AIKEN. It is difficult to tell, because of changing values from week to week.

Mr. BREWSTER. Naturally the potato producers are rather resentful of the fact that they seem to have been singled out as constituting the worst problem in the situation. We are told that wheat and corn have had no loss. That was true during the war. The Senator from Illinois, the majority leader, [Mr. LUCAS], was generous and frank enough to admit last fall that we had a tremendously critical and serious problem in connection with wheat and corn, and it was my thought that it would be fair to ask what were the assets of the Commodity Credit Corporation at current prices, in order that we might know whether at this time we face a serious loss.

Mr. AIKEN. It is safe to say that the current value of those assets would be less than the cost to the Government, because there has been deterioration. We hear reports of weevily wheat, for instance, stored in boats instead of elevators.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is it not also true that the market value is materially less?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes, that is true; for the wheat that cost the Government, say, $2.20 or $2.30 a bushel last year, considering the fact that it is a year old, and the millers will not buy old wheat if they can get new wheat, has probably deteriorated 30 or 40 cents a bushel.

Mr. BREWSTER. That would be 20 percent.

Mr. AIKEN. Approximately.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG. I must take exception to what the Senator from Vermont said with respect to wheat. We have stored wheat for years and years. In fact, when World War II was coming upon us, we had large quantities of wheat that had been stored for years. So far as I remember, a very small percentage of that wheat ever spoiled, probably less than one-half of 1 percent. Wheat can be stored for years and years, and oftentimes the millers prefer older wheat. Presently, last year's wheat is selling to the millers at a premium over this year's wheat.

Mr. AIKEN. My information came from the millers, who said they preferred fresh wheat to old wheat.

Mr. BREWSTER. Let me ask the Senator from North Dakota what the carry-over is.

Mr. YOUNG. Between three hundred and three hundred and fifty million bushels. That is the estimated carry-over for the end of this fiscal year July 1. Personally, I do not think that is a big surplus. We have already spent more than $1,000,000,000 accumulating scarce war materials and the last session appropriated another $800,000,000 for the same purpose. Surely a reasonable carry-over of wheat is as necessary as some of these scarce materials such as castor oil which we are stock piling. I think a reasonable carry-over of food products is just as essential as carrying over some other products.

Mr. BREWSTER. What would the Senator from North Dakota say about the corn crop?

Mr. YOUNG. I am not so familiar with the corn situation as I am with wheat, but I do not think the present situation is bad. If there should be a big crop this year, as there was last year, there would probably be a sizable surplus.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would the Senator from North Dakota think that with reasonable guarantees the shrinkage of wheat and corn would not exceed $12,000,000, which is the amount involved in the potato discussion?

Mr. YOUNG. There is some shrinkage in poundage. If wheat is put in storage at 60 or 58 pounds to the bushel, it dries out, and there is a little loss in weight, but there is not a loss in value; when wheat becomes dryer the weight per bushel increases resulting in a higher grade wheat which naturally sells for a higher price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reference to the question of the Senator from Maine as to the cost of the entire farm program, I too have been interested, but I have not been able to get an answer, except that I note that these products are being offered for export at an average discount of near 40 percent below cost. So that if we assume they are going to export these products—and I do not know how they will get rid of them otherwise—the loss will be about $1,500,000,000. If we destroy them as proposed by Secretary Brannan the cost will be more.

On the other hand, if we are to accept the assumption that we will be confronted with a war this year or next year, the disposition of these heavy inventories might very well turn out to be at a profit. But I am one who does not want to endorse here a farm program based upon a war every 15 years to bail us out. We need a peacetime farm program. The only thing that bailed the farm program out in the 1940's was the coming on of World War II.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine will yield, the export price of wheat naturally is lower than the domestic price, because we entered into the international wheat agreement, which called for a price of $1.80 a bushel. I think it is to the interest of the chicken growers in Delaware to have a little surplus, because if we have a drought next year resulting in a short supply they will be paying much more for wheat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The poultrymen in my State never have come to Congress and asked the Government to underwrite or subsidize their farm losses. For the last 3 months they have been taking losses greater than were ever experienced in Delaware for the past 20 years, and I do not except even the year 1932. They are going through a greater depression today than the farmers in the Midwest faced in 1932, yet these same farmers passed a resolution only last week saying they still are not asking the Government to bail them out. I wish the constituents of the Senators from the Northwest would take the same attitude, that they too would be willing to underwrite their own responsibilities. We cannot continue this present policy of supporting one segment of agriculture at high prices while completely ignoring another group of farmers.

Mr. YOUNG. I think it is a matter of record that the poultry producers of Delaware made their largest profits in 1932, and along about that time, when wheat was selling for as low as 28 cents a bushel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where did the Senator get his figures? I ask that because his statement indicates that he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. YOUNG. Did not the poultrymen make larger profits?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator now asking a question?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am saying "No."

Mr. YOUNG. When was the period when they made their greatest profits?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The period when the farmers of Delaware made the most money was the same period when the farmers of the Middle West made the most money, namely, during the war, and now that the war is over your western farmers are still insisting on higher than wartime prices.

Mr. YOUNG. Were not the poultry raisers of Delaware making a high profit when wheat was selling for 28 cents a bushel?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In 1932 they sold poultry for as low as 11 cents a pound. Our eastern farmers were not making money at that time, any more than you did. Today the Government is supporting wheat at $1.95. Yet the average price at which wheat sold for the last 10 years including the war years was only $1.49. That is around 25 percent higher than during the war years.

Mr. YOUNG. The cost of production is going up.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the farmers are not supposed to be guaranteed their cost of production plus wartime profits.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I should like to know about how much wheat we are going to send abroad under the international wheat agreement.

Mr. YOUNG. I think our allotment was about 160,000,000 bushels.

Mr. AIKEN. One hundred and sixty-eight million bushels.

Mr. BREWSTER. How much are we sacrificing in the price, over what it was?

Mr. YOUNG. Forty cents a bushel presently.

Mr. BREWSTER. It would be about $140,000,000?

Mr. YOUNG. It would be about $80,000,000 which comes out of the Commodity Credit Corporation funds.

Mr. BREWSTER. The international wheat agreement, which is in connection with the wheat program, will cost us approximately $100,000,000?

Mr. YOUNG. I think that figure is substantially correct. It may run that much with Japan, Germany, or countries included in the recent deal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After we get through with the export program, we will still have 400,000,000 bushels being held by the Commodity Credit Corporation, for which we have no market. If we continue these high support prices another 2 years we will have even more, unless we begin destroying surplus wheat as is now recommended for surplus potatoes.

Mr. YOUNG. All farmers should be working together, whether they be in Delaware, Iowa, or North Dakota. It is to the interest of the whole Nation to maintain the agricultural economy, and if for a year or two we have a problem regarding potatoes, it does not mean that we should abandon the program. It is to the best interests of the consumer, as well as of the producers, to keep an even supply of any food commodity at a fair price. I think the potato situation can be cleared up, but probably some different provisions in controlling production will have to be put into effect.

Mr. BREWSTER. I believe the Senator from Vermont rose.

Mr. AIKEN. I was rising to point out two things. The Senator from Maine suggested that the finger of scorn is pointed at the potato grower. I would narrow that a little, and say that now it is pointed at the Maine potato grower. Why potatoes have been moved from all the other States, and a great surplus permitted to remain in Maine all this time, is something beyond my understanding. It is also beyond my understanding why there has been no concerted movement to bring about the consumption of potatoes as there has been in the case of other commodities. But except for offering to turn them over to public institutions, or charitable institutions, I know of no concerted effort to move the surplus of potatoes, which amounts to about 1⅓ pecks per capita.

The other matter I desire to point out is that while the potato growers of Maine were reducing their acreage 10 percent, the Canadian growers were increasing theirs 10 percent, for the obvious purpose of shipping potatoes into the United States to take advantage of our market.

So far as I know, there has been no effort by the Department or by the administration this year to control the importation of Canadian potatoes, as there was a year ago. I do not know the reason for that. I do not know why a huge accumulation of potatoes has been permitted to remain in the State of Maine, when the surplus has been moved from most of the other States. I do not know why our Government looks complacently upon a 10-percent increase in potato acreage in Canada while insisting on a 10-percent decrease in potato acreage in the United States, knowing full well that the additional Canadian potatoes are coming into the United States to be sold on our market. I do not believe the administration as yet has given any satisfactory answer to that situation, which indicates that there might be a real attempt, a deliberate attempt, to discredit the laws which the Congress has passed.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I wish to make this comment to the Senator from Vermont. I wonder if he would agree with me that the best way to define such a method and such a program is by the word "cock-eyed"? Does he agree with me?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know whether I would say that or not. I believe that in the top flights of our Department of Agriculture we now have a political ambition which, if not controlled, will bring the agriculture of the United States crashing down to earth, and probably the whole economy with it in time.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I appreciate the contribution made by the Senator from New Hampshire. The situation certainly justifies very strong language, because 1 year ago, when Mr. Trigg, the head of the Commodity Credit Corporation—and I talked with him about the matter—found this influx of potatoes from Canada, he made such strong representations to the administration that within a single month, with unprecedented celerity, our State Department negotiated an agreement with Canada, unquestionably under the threat that if she did not agree to it, we would immediately exercise our rights of escape under the reciprocal trade agreement. Canada entered into that agreement by which she agreed not to ship any more potatoes into this country for table use, because we had 100,000,000 bushels surplus; and she further agreed that whatever potatoes she would ship in for seed purposes would be for use in certain months, and that they were to be certified to the certain areas, and guaranteed to be used for seed purposes only.

The implementation of that understanding was not all that could be desired, because when we came to test it, the State Department referred us to the Treasury Department, the Treasury Department referred us to the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Agriculture referred us to the Commodity Credit Corporation. By that time 9,000,000 bushels of potatoes had leaped the barrier and had come into the United States. But a serious and earnest attempt was made to meet the problem.

Now, the amazing thing is that this year, with the figures showing there would be a surplus in an undetermined amount in July of this year, according to my understanding the agreement has been abrogated. The Secretary of Agriculture was not clear whether they abrogated it or whether it terminated by its own terms. That is a matter which is not clear in the record. The fact is, however, that no effort of any character was made to stop the influx for this year. If the Department could do it last year it could do it this year.

Mr. TOBEY. Was there a time limit on the agreement?

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not think there was a time limit on it. I cannot state that accurately. But the Secretary of Agriculture himself—and I think this is significant—did not know when he came here Monday to testify. In other words, he had been so utterly uninterested in stopping the Canadian influx that he did not know whether the agreement was terminated, or whether it was terminable, or what had been done in regard to it. He did nothing to secure its reinstatement. I think he knew that Canada had a greater surplus this year than a year ago and that the influx would be much greater.

One other curious fact: Last year the Department estimated 250,000,000 bushels of potatoes as the amount desirable. This year, 1950, they have estimated the requirements at 335,000,000 bushels. A curious and a somewhat sinister fact emerges, that, under the reciprocal trade agreement with Canada, if at any time our production in this country is below 350,000,000 bushels, then the difference between that 350,000,000 bushels and whatever our total production is, may be sent into this country at the reduced tariff rate. In other words, our own Department of Agriculture has fixed a potato goal which would allow 15,000,000 bushels additional to come into this country at a 50-percent reduction in the tariff rate if they are successful in achieving their goal. I asked the Secretary what he was going to do about that. Apparently he had thought of it before, but he said, "We will talk with the State Department about it and see if they will not do something about it."

This is all consistent with the intimation by the Senator from Vermont that it is possible that a great deal of this was planned that way. I am not undertaking to defend the production of potatoes in this country. I am undertaking to say that an efficient and an economical and a prudent administration would have known many of these facts 6 months ago, and have submitted them to us, rather than have waited until now to bring the situation to our attention.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, may I respectfully make a suggestion? Does not the situation indicate clearly that the thing that is needful to do is for the Senator from Maine, GEORGE AIKEN—I am speaking now as Senators understand this problem—to sit down with Brannan and Trigg, and with the State Department officials who have jurisdiction, and get together to the point where they cannot pass the buck, so the responsibility can be pinned somewhere and in event responsibility can be fixed, we can say, "Thou art the man."

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the records are perfectly clear as to where the responsibilities lie. I think the Agricultural Committee was correct when it left the responsibility with the Secretary of Agriculture. I want to have it clear in the RECORD that the Secretary testified that under the law he has full authority—I should like to have the Senator from Vermont correct me if I am not correct—and that he also has the funds with which to convert these potatoes if he deems it to be advisable to do so. The question of the use of that money is a matter within his discretion.

Mr. AIKEN. If the Senator from Maine will permit, I should like to add that in the Commodity Credit charter bill enacted last June the President was instructed to appoint an advisory board of five persons to advise the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Secretary whenever he arrives at a situation where he feels that advice is desirable and necessary. That committee was appointed the same day the Secretary came before the Agricultural Committee. That was day before yesterday. Yet the Secretary suggested to us that the Senate Agricultural Committee—not the House Agricultural Committee, but the Senate Agricultural Committee—advise him what to do, thereby taking the props out from under the advisory committee which we had authorized to be set up for that very purpose.

Instead of going to this advisory committee he comes to the Senate Agricultural Committee and says that if we do not veto his proposal, he is going to destroy approximately 50,000,000 bushels of potatoes. Of course, that is not the business of the Senate Agricultural Committee. It is not the business of any committee of Congress. If we undertake, in detail, to apply the laws we pass, we will not only be exceeding our own jurisdiction, but we will be getting into trouble every day. I hope the Secretary, by making this suggestion, did not want us to get into trouble. That is an administrative responsibility purely and simply. We have given the Secretary ample authority to dispose of this potato crop. The potato-surplus situation could be relieved if the Secretary would put on a drive such as he did for fried chicken and other commodities, to bring about just a little added consumption on the part of each person, and if the administration would exercise its authority to shut out this excessive importation of potatoes from Canada.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont one question, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Missouri.

I hold in my hand the Legislative Daily Report of Government Affairs. It was issued on Wednesday, February 1. I read from it as follows:

> Senator AIKEN added that there was almost unanimous feeling by the committee that the problem of disposing of the surplus is an executive responsibility rather than a legislative function.
> Shortly after the committee's refusal to tell the Department what to do with the surplus, a spokesman for Secretary Brannan said the refusal amounted to a clear go-ahead signal to destroy the potatoes. He estimated that the 40,000,000 bushels of the 1949 crop will be destroyed. These will have been purchased by the Government as part of its program to support prices.

Is that interpretation of the action of the committee justified?

Mr. AIKEN. It certainly is not. The Secretary, at any time, had the right to ask us as individuals what we would recommend. He did not, at any time, have the right to ask a legislative committee to make administrative decisions. He would have been completely wrong in attempting to do so. The only purpose of such a request would be to place the responsibility for the things that go wrong on the Congress, rather than on the executive branch of the Government where it properly belongs. The executive branch of the Government would be right there to take credit for everything that goes right. I thought it was extremely presumptuous to expect a committee to do that. It is extremely significant that he did not ask the House committee for the same advice. I think it is a well-known fact that usually the House committee and the Secretary get along much better than do the Senate committee and the Secretary.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. The act authorizing the appointment of a board of directors for the Commodity Credit Corporation, and of an advisory board, was enacted at the last session, was it not?

Mr. AIKEN. That measure became law last June.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator know why the Secretary delayed the appointment of members of the board of directors and members of the advisory board until 2 or 3 days ago?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know. The appointments are made by the President, I suppose on the recommendation of the Secretary.

Mr. KEM. Is it possible that the Secretary did not feel himself in need of any advice during all the months which intervened between the passage of the act last June and the present time?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know what he thought. I believe that had the board been set up and functioning it could have been a help to him in a case of this kind.

Mr. KEM. He would have had a board officially authorized to give him advice on this subject, instead of coming to the Senate committee.

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct. Congress had already authorized a board for this specific purpose. Then, almost without notice, the Secretary asked the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to advise him.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator know of any law or custom which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to come to the Senate committee for advice as to whether or not he should take administrative action?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not think there is any law. I do not think it is the custom.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator know why he came to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for advice as to the disposal of potatoes in Maine, any more than wheat in Kansas, Missouri, and North Dakota, or corn, cotton, or any of the other commodities that are on his hands?

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know why he came. I am sure it was not because he thought the judgment of the Senate committee was better than his own, because many times he has expressed disapproval of the ideas of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KEM. When he was before the Senate committee, did he ask for advice in connection with the disposal of any other surpluses except potatoes?

Mr. AIKEN. Not that I recall—and particularly Maine potatoes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, one other question arose. I note that the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is in the Chamber. I want to share with him a portion of the responsibility for this surplus. I have in my hand the report of potato production for the year 1949. I find that in Florida, according to the Government report, there was an increase from 3,745,000 bushels in 1948 to 5,428,000 in 1949, an increase in production of about 1,700,000 bushels, or approximately 40 percent. That was probably the result of good growing weather rather than any other factors which entered into the picture; but it did contribute in some measure to the resultant surplus, as Maine is the last State to market. While it is true that we raise only about 15 percent of the potatoes in the country, we have between 30 and 35 percent of the surplus, partly because we are the last State to go to market—all the others reach there first—and partly because of the Canadian importations, which are directly competitive with our own production. So we get the chief impact of this situation.

The thing which I should like to leave in the record clearly is that we have made substantial progress. That is what I like to think. The potato growers recognized that this situation could not continue. They asked for a reduction in the support price, which reduced the surplus by more than 10 percent last year. We believe that it will reduce it by more than 10 percent this year, so we should be easily within reach of achievement of the goal of eliminating the cost of this support. By this change we have saved the Government $125,000,000 at the very least, and probably somewhat more.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator understand from the excerpt he has read from some publication that it is the present intention of the Secretary of Agriculture to destroy all potatoes he now has on hand?

Mr. BREWSTER. That is what it says. The statement says that the spokesman for Secretary Brannan stated that the refusal amounted to a clear signal to go ahead, and he estimated that 40,000,000 bushels would be destroyed.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator know what the Secretary meant when he spoke to the committee yesterday about the alternative of dumping of potatoes in the potato-producing districts and on the farms?

Mr. BREWSTER. The question is what method will be used. Before they heaped the potatoes in great piles and poured oil or something else on them, and the Government was accountable for the destruction. It was my understanding that this time they are considering asking each producer to dump them on his own land. That is what I have heard discussed, but I cannot speak authoritatively.

Mr. KEM. So that as much of them as possible could be used for food for livestock?

Mr. BREWSTER. They may still be used for livestock if there is no Government expense for transportation. Apparently that plan is not feasible for much of the amount.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. AIKEN. I understand that at his press conference this morning the President gave the Senator from Maine credit for the present deplorable situation in the potato market and for the large surplus which we have on hand, stating that the Senator from Maine was successful in adding a mandatory-support amendment to the bill. In view of that, I think I should state how the provision got into the bill. As is well known, the potato growers requested the Congress to reduce their support level from 90 percent, and from time to time they have so expressed their opinion to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Last year, when the Anderson bill was under consideration, a committee of three, including one man from Maine, one from Red River Valley, and one from North Carolina waited on me, and I presume on other Senators, giving their opinion as to what ought to be done. This committee of three asked to have the 60-to-90-percent support included in the Anderson bill. That support was included in the bill. I do not recall that the Senator from Maine proposed such an amendment to the Anderson bill itself. Perhaps he can refresh my memory. I believe it was a committee amendment.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct. The year before an amendment to include potatoes in the support was offered from the floor, but last year, in the Anderson bill, it was included by the committee. We had a meeting in the Agricultural Committee room, at which many Members of Congress and potato growers were present, and it was at the request of the growers that that was done. I appreciate the compliment of the President in suggesting that I am either omnipotent or omniscient, but I am afraid he gives me too much credit.

Mr. AIKEN. The Secretary reduced the support level for potatoes from 90 percent to 60 percent of parity, although he himself claimed 100 percent was necessary to afford the farmer a good living. He reduced it to 60 percent of parity and set the acreage for the producers to plant. In 1948 and 1949 the producers planted fewer acres than were requested by the Secretary.

Mr. BREWSTER. They reduced the acreage by 40 percent in the past few years.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not see how the potato growers themselves or the Senator from Maine can be held responsible for the present situation. I say that no determined effort on the part of the administration officials has been made to relieve the potato situation. It is apparent that the potato situation is being dramatized, with particular emphasis on the State of Maine, for a particular purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not a fact that the only criticism the Secretary has ever made of the present farm-support program is that he wanted to give the potato farmers, the wheat farmers, and everyone else more money than they are now receiving? He is advocating 100 percent parity.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Had Congress accepted the recommendations of Secretary Brannan we would have on the books now a law which would cost the taxpayers several times more than the existing law.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is one of the aspects of the proposal which I think should be very carefully considered.

I should like to say at the moment to the Senator from Vermont that there is another curious aspect of this situation. Assuming the complete sincerity of the Secretary of Agriculture in wanting to make this program work, and appreciating that the potato problem was a serious one which had been much discussed, with the general surplus of potatoes coming over the horizon, and with the 40 percent surplus already existing in Florida, which is the first State where the potato market comes in, the Secretary of Agriculture inaugurated, last year, for the first time in the history of the mandatory support program; a support price for No. 2 potatoes and for size B No. 1 potatoes. Of course, that was very nice for the potato growers; they did not object to it. They were very happy if they could sell No. 2's and size B's. But if the Department of Agriculture was concerned about reducing the cost of the program to the Government and about disposing of the surplus, that was a rather curious decision. I raised the question last July, in a discussion of the matter on the floor of the Senate with the Senator from Vermont, when the potato crop was in process of being marketed. I asked why it was that, for the first time, the Department inaugurated such a policy. Could it be that the planners were framing the program in such a way as to be able to say, "Now we have 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 bushels of potatoes which we have to dump"? Could it be that they planned that, when they could see the Canadian potatoes coming on the market and when they knew there would be a large surplus?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. I think the Senator knows that in the western areas, particularly in western North Dakota and Montana, we had a bad drought situation last year, and as a result there is a shortage of livestock feeds. I have received 20 or 30 telegrams from county agents in that area requesting surplus potatoes for livestock feed. Potatoes make very good feed. They are willing to pay at least a part of the cost of the potatoes. When used for such purposes, the potatoes are dumped on the ground, where they naturally dehydrate, making good livestock feed until late in the spring. That is a very good use of surplus potatoes. Certainly far better than dumping.

If the Secretary of Agriculture proposes to destroy the potatoes, when a good alternative use can be made of them, then I think criticism of him would be justified.

Mr. BREWSTER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. The Senator heard the Secretary of Agriculture testify before the committee that in his opinion a reduction of the price is not a good way to control the production of a commodity.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. KEM. If that is the case, and since the Secretary of Agriculture believes that to be the case, does the Senator know why the Secretary reduced the support price of potatoes to 60 percent of parity?

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the Senator from Missouri asked the Secretary of Agriculture that very question, and he found no adequate reply.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator from Maine know why he did it?

Mr. BREWSTER. No. I think our idea in reducing the support price was to discourage overproduction, and in evidence of that we submit the fact that it has made a very material progress, when it has eliminated 50,000,000 bushels already, or more than 10 percent; and we believe that this year we shall see a further cut.

In other words, in the case of the one major crop whose producers are making a fine constructive effort to solve this problem, and who have made a great contribution in reducing the cost of the program, when we have eliminated in one year $125,000,000 of the cost, whereas up to a few years ago we estimated that it would cost only $50,000,000, we suddenly discover that, as a result of what the Department of Agriculture has done, the cost will be increased. Responsibility for a part of the increased cost—certainly at least $30,000,000 of the $100,000,000—must clearly be borne by the administration for dumping the Canadian potatoes on the market and for substituting the class B size and the No. 2's. That is the responsibility of the Department. If the Department had exercised any ordinary intelligence and ingenuity, it could have reduced the cost even more.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me say that of course the Senator from Maine understands that the cull potatoes were bought by the Government at the same price as that of No. 1 potatoes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes; at 60 percent of parity. They did not buy them at a lower price, but at the full support price, although I think Congress had assumed that 60 percent of parity would be the price for No. 1 potatoes only. Certainly I had always assumed that to be the case.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, does the Senator know of any possible reason on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture for reducing the support price, if he did not believe that it would reduce production?

Mr. BREWSTER. It seems to me absolutely inconceivable, if that was not the purpose. He said he had adequate powers. Apparently he was exercising in good faith those he did have.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to say that the Assistant Administrator of PMA, Mr. Lennartson, when he appeared before the Committee on Agriculture the other day to explain why the support price for eggs was not working, gave a very good explanation, namely, that the support being offered is not high enough to induce the dryers to take the eggs. However, it is significant that the Department has fixed the price of eggs at 75 percent of parity, rather than at 90 percent of parity, as was done last year.

When I asked him how they happened to arrive at 75 percent of parity as the support level, he said they felt that was the level which would bring the supply in line with the demand.

Mr. LANGER. Madam President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. SMITH of Maine in the chair). The Senator from Maine has the floor. He can yield only for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator this question: In view of the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture has now recommended lower support prices for eggs and potatoes, in order to decrease the production, is it not logical to assume that if the support prices on all the commodities which are accumulating in the warehouses of the country are lowered, that this action would to a large extent solve the surplus problem and at the same time would save the taxpayers a large amount of money?

Mr. BREWSTER. Certainly in the potato field that has been demonstrated by the figures I have given, and we have been quite ready to be the guinea pig in connection with this matter. Although the other crops were continuing at 90 percent of parity as the support price, the potato growers, as the Senator from Vermont pointed cut, suggested and supported this idea of reduction in the support price, which has enabled us to make the progress to which I have alluded.

Now we hope that the producers of the other great crops of this country, who are equally concerned with this problem, will not be too critical of the efforts of the potato growers to meet this problem.

We believe that in this year, 1950, we may well be within sight of a goal or an objective that will cost the Government very little to achieve, and at the same time will give us production in line with the need.

Madam President, in this connection there is another item that is curious. There was in Maine a man who was canning potatoes. There may be some argument as to whether canning would impede the production of potatoes otherwise; but there is much to indicate that the canning of potatoes will supply a new field, because in many city homes it is not practical to keep potatoes. The man to whom I refer was canning potatoes, but the Government officials refused to sell the surplus potatoes to him at a lower price, although that would have been a very effective way to dispose of them. I think he was taking about two carloads of potatoes a week, but the officials refused to sell the surplus potatoes to him. He could not understand it at the time. Perhaps we can understand it now, in light of what has developed.

I wish to express my appreciation for this opportunity to make the record clear, so that at least Senators and Representatives and members of the press who may discuss this matter may have available the facts in regard to the factors which have contributed to this problem at this time.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article by Herbert Moore, dealing with the Aroostook potato situation.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADVENTUROUS AROOSTOOK FARMERS HAVE SEEN BOTH PROSPERITY AND ADVERSITY

(By Herbert W. Moore, executive secretary, the Potato Industry Council of Maine, Inc.)

You have been reading much about the Maine potato industry in recent months. It has been the favorite subject for various political writers, who with little regard for the truth, have sought to create an exceedingly distorted and false picture of its way of life.

All of these writings have centered about the wartime price-support program which ceased to exist a year ago, and have given absolutely no recognition to the picturesque and romantic development of an industry which within the past century has transformed a bleak impenetrable forest land into the most concentrated, and most heavily mechanized agricultural area in New England.

Aroostook, a county the size of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and Rhode Island combined but with only 10 percent of its area cleared of timber, and its gigantic potato industry which each year harvests 15 percent of the total national potato production, is by reason of its unique development perhaps far more removed psychologically than it is geographically from the rest of New England agriculture.

As with the progress and development of our great Nation and its historic expansion from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the progress and development of the Aroostook potato industry has also centered around the railroad. In our case, however, the direction has been northward rather than westward and for the most part has taken place in the first half of the twentieth century.

AROOSTOOK'S WESTERN ATMOSPHERE

Since the Civil War Aroostook has been actively engaged in the production of potatoes but without adequate transportation facilities its potato production was converted in its entirety to the manufacture of starch for use in the New England textile industry.

With the coming of the railroads in the latter part of the nineteenth century however, the development of the Maine potato as a national delicacy began and it was only a matter of a few years before it assumed a commanding role in the life and diet of the entire population of the eastern seaboard.

Perhaps because of the nature of our growth, more analogous to the development of the West than of New England, a westerner would feel right at home in Aroostook. Instead of grain elevators beside the tracks, however, he would see potato houses. Since the direction of our growth has been northward he probably would find weather conditions more severe, but he would recognize the general atmosphere and feeling which permeates the area as distinctly that of the cattle country, the wheat country, or the irrigated country.

By reason of the nature of this industry which involves such tremendous financial risks as to stagger the imagination, there has developed a people who by virtue of their past experiences are hardy, adventurous, keen, and tenacious.

In fact, their willingness to take risks has resulted in the development of a production know-how that is without peer. Nor have they stopped there. With the same energy and aggressiveness, by means of self-imposed taxes, they are financing continual projects aimed at the betterment of storing and merchandising their great crop to insure the consuming public of superior quality at minimum cost.

LOSSES MIXED WITH PROFITS

Let's take a moment and review the financial history of Aroostook, where until now the potato has been king and where diversification has been very limited in scope. Here are the figures for the profit or loss that the average farmer received per barrel, charging all the costs and all the returns. These figures are exceptionally dependable as cost figures go. They were assembled by an impartial expert. They are based on hundreds of farms. Starting with 1926 the figures run like this; 1926, profit 78 cents a barrel; 1927, loss 9 cents; 1928, loss $1.40; 1929, profit $1.50; 1930, loss 44 cents; 1931, loss $1.06; 1932, loss 65 cents; 1933, profit 54 cents; 1934, loss 65 cents; 1935, profit 29 cents; 1936, profit 89 cents; 1937, loss 55 cents; 1938, loss 16 cents; 1939, profit 14 cents; 1940, loss 67 cents.

No wonder bankruptcy was general, that mortgage companies were desperately trying to get out. No wonder the potato country is inhabited by men more adventurous than the typical New England farmer, men who can take it. They have had to.

Since 1940 there have been the war and price support. The area has had a period of stability and relative prosperity heretofore unknown. The prosperity however has been much more modest than the most lurid stories that have gone out have led the general public to believe. Here are the profit figures for these years every one a profit, but a modest one: 1941, 43 cents; 1942, 70 cents; 1943, 31 cents; 1944, 34 cents; 1945, 95 cents; 1946, 53 cents; 1947, 53 cents. This, remember, is per barrel. A barrel is 3 bushels. To get the profit per bushel divide by 3.

Unfortunately, figures from this authoritative source are not available since 1947.

Nineteen hundred and forty-eight was a year of profits, the last year of operation under wartime legislation and the subject for so much publicity in recent months. The estimate for that year is 90 cents per barrel of merchantable potatoes (less than for the year 1936). In consumer's terms, one-half cent a pound. And that profit includes the Government payments that have been so widely advertised.

MOST OF FARMS SMALL

These 8 years constitute the only period for which there is authentic history of stable prosperity in the potato country.

To get an even more realistic picture of the degree of the prosperity of our area let us look for a moment at a typical farm.

It distinctly is not a big operation that has been pictured so widely. In Aroostook County, where 90 percent of Maine's potato acreage exists, there were 4,338 potato farmers in 1949. Of these only 21 had over 200 acres of potatoes, 90 more had between 100 and 200 acres, 4,227, or 97 percent, had less than 100 acres. Most of them less than 50. Nearly one-half of all the farms were limited to less than 20 acres. These farms are farmer-owned and operated with 95 percent of the growers actually living on the farms. True the ordinary farmer has lived a little better than usual these last few years. More of the houses are painted. The machinery on most of the farms is fairly modern and fairly adequate and much of it is paid for. Mortgages are smaller and in better shape. But the farmer still has to borrow money to buy his fertilizer and seed and pay the potato pickers. He hasn't gotten far enough ahead to finance his next year's operations by himself and there are seasons of the year when the financial shoe pinches pretty tight.

Even in the face of this, however, these farmers of their own initiative, sought the abandonment of high-level wartime price supports.

They did not want profits to be guaranteed by the Government. This is not the way the industry had been developed up here. Only through Yankee ingenuity and thrift had it survived the economic rigors of the past and it had no desire to radically change this position in the future.

It did recognize, however, that because of its very nature—an industry consisting of thousands of small growers—it did not of itself possess the machinery by which it could effect even a reasonable stability. Therefore, it decided to experiment with a new idea—that of letting Government provide the machinery whereby its economy could be brought more nearly into line with that of industry, labor, and other segments of agriculture in the area.

FIRE INSURANCE SUPPORT

They have thus come up with a fire insurance price support, the level of which will not even cover the farmer's costs. This experimental plan has just begun to operate in 1949, but it is too early to determine what all the effects will be. We do know this much, however: The 1949 crop will bring in less than two-thirds what the 1948 crop brought in despite a record yield. In 1949 the average farmer will go behind. He won't go down and out—not yet.

The ordinary farmer will dig into savings, if he has any. He will go further into debt if his credit will stand it. He will stop repairs and replacements and live partly on the depreciation of his buildings and equipment.

In 1950 the potato country faces a further cut in acreage—nearly 15 percent more. The 30-acre farmer therefore will become a 25-acre farmer. And price support will be lower still. It will not and cannot underwrite the stabilized moderate prosperity that Aroostook enjoyed for the first time in its life from 1941 to 1948.

That is the true picture of Aroostook.

EIGHTEEN POUNDS IN 1909—41 NOW

Where will we go from here? The next few years will tell us that. If our present experiments indicate still more controls and continued restrictions in acreage we will not be able to put up with it for long. At least not for what we are getting out of it now.

Then we shall try again.

We hear much talk about the Brannan plan, the features of which have been under study in this area for years but its practical operation has created many doubts in the mind of the farmer.

In any event, in the firm belief that a reasonably stabilized and a reasonably prosperous agriculture is a primary requisite for a healthy national economy and with bitter memories of the depressions in the past half century all of which started at the farm, the residents of Aroostook are earnestly seeking some means of maintaining some of the stability they have enjoyed for the past 8 years.

Many accusations have been made that price supports have caused high potato prices. True, potatoes cost somewhat more than they did several years ago, but so does everything else. It is interesting to note however that in the period 1909 to 1914 one hour of labor in industry would purchase 18.2 pounds of potatoes at the farm whereas in 1948, one hour of labor in industry would buy 41 pounds. And still we hear that potatoes are high priced.

We continue to hear also that the farmer is responsible for higher potato costs. This is not true. In years gone by, when potatoes were sold in bulk the housewife loaded herself down with potatoes when she went to market. Now storekeepers do not want to sell potatoes that way. They want them in small packages so that the housewife will have room to carry out other merchandise. The housewife also wants them that way for her own convenience in handling. Fancy packaging in small lots costs money. That is why even if we gave the potatoes away here at the farm the housewife would still pay anywhere from 1½ to 4½ cents per pound for them at her local store as a result of the costs of packaging, distribution and merchandising.

RAISING OF BEEF CATTLE

As far as 1950 is concerned, and with or without support, the only hope of fair returns is that by some miracle the national average yield per acre which has been mounting year by year should suddenly turn downward resulting a relative shortage of potatoes and prices well above support levels. There is a chance of that—a bigger chance than in recent years—but not big enough on which to pin very substantial hopes.

There is one other ground for hope in the potato country on the long-time basis. It doesn't promise much for the immediate future. It can't be done that fast. That is that the farmer will be able to expand the production of other farm products to supplement his potato sales.

He won't give up potato raising, unless he has to. But potato acreages are down and down permanently. The great increase in yields per acre—nearly doubled nationally—and the spectacular drop in potato consumption make old acreages entirely out of the picture. The Aroostook farmer now has more acres not needed for potatoes. With the lower returns from the potatoes he does grow he must put these idle acres to work if he is to survive.

At the present time the biggest development appears to be the expansion of dairying although the raising of beef cattle is also assuming considerable proportions.

We are not going to go out of the potato business, but rather will add other farm products to what potato business we have left. The combination seems a very sound one, and brings about a diversification never before experienced in the area.

That is our history and that is our story—certainly unique in modern New England history and certainly less remunerative than others would have you believe.

This past 50 years has seen our complete development and growth. Our troubles have been many, our heartaches great, but they have been overcome.

Our progress will continue to be governed by the adventurous, hard-headed and progressive thinking of our people and regardless of the obstacles we shall continue to maintain our place in the economic life of New England and the Nation.

PARITY PRICES FOR CERTAIN BASIC AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Mr. YOUNG. Madam President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill. The bill is an amendment to the Anderson Act, and would make 90-percent supports mandatory for basic commodities, when farmers are under either acreage controls or quotas. This bill, if enacted into law, would prevent drastic cuts in the income of farmers. The lowered farm income of the past year may well, if continued in the future, bring on another depression far worse than the last one. I think the prevention of such a situation is to the best interest of the entire Nation and will even help materially in balancing future Federal budgets.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2977) to provide support at 90 percent of parity for any crop of any basic agricultural commodity for which marketing quotas or acreage allotments are in effect, introduced by Mr. YOUNG (for himself and Mr. RUSSELL), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. COOLEY, Mr. PACE, Mr. POAGE, Mr. HOPE, and Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

CODIFICATION OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4080) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Mr. KEFAUVER obtained the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Madam President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of my suggesting the absence of a quorum, it being understood that he will not thereby lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum, and that further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MAGNUSON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I desire to speak at some length in support of House bill 4080, as amended, which was reported favorably to the Senate by the Senate Committee on Armed Services on June 10, 1949. The bill, which was passed by the House of Representatives on May 5, 1949, is entitled "A bill to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the Disciplinary Laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a uniform code of military justice."

I desire to pay my very high respects, Mr. President, to the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], who has worked long, and with his usual patience and ability, on this proposed legislation; to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]; to the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], who has taken a great deal of interest in the subject, and also to Mr. Mark H. Galusha, of the Senate staff, who has done a great deal of worth-while work in connection with this proposed legislation.

This is a most important bill, and I hope full consideration will be given to it by the Members of the Senate. Its purpose is to provide a new and better system of justice in the military forces of the United States. It was drafted by a special committee in the National Military Establishment, which was instructed by the late Secretary Forrestal to achieve three important objectives. He desired that there be a uniform code of military justice which would protect the rights of those subject to it, increase public confidence in military justice, and not impair the performance of military functions. Secretary Johnson has joined in urging the passage of the bill. Our committee is of the opinion that the proposed code more nearly achieves these objectives than does any other study that has been made.

Before I explain the general provisions of the bill now before us, I think it will be profitable for all Members to consider this new bill against the background of experience with the present court-martial systems.

As Senators well know, historians have traced the origin of military law to the armies of the Greeks and the Romans. Military law has existed side by side with civilian codes and statutes over the centuries. Our own military and naval codes derive more immediately from western European procedures as developed in England and on the Continent. Continental influence has been strong, and, as a consequence, our military law has always borne many striking resemblances to the civil law, as contrasted with the Anglo-American common law. Over the years, many rules and practices have been brought over from the common law, such as the presumption of innocence, the privilege against self-incrimination, and the common-law rules of evidence. The proposed Uniform Code makes a number of additional steps in this direction.

I shall not take the time to trace the development of British military law, but it was from this source that present court-martial systems of the Army and Navy were adopted. The Articles of War, first adopted by the Continental Congress on June 30, 1775, were copied from British articles of 1765. They were redrafted by John Adams and reenacted in 1776 and enacted again as Articles of War in 1806 pursuant to the section of the Constitution which provides that Congress may make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces. There was, thereafter, no formal revision of the Articles of War until 1874, and this was more a rearrangement and classification than an actual revision. A further rearrangement took place in 1916, but it was not until 1920 that the Articles of War were completely revised.

Many radical changes were made at that time to meet the objections of those who had criticized the existing code. The articles of 1920, as amended in 1931, 1937, 1942, and 1948, constitute the law of the United States Army and Air Force today.

As was the case with the early American Articles of War, the first American Naval Articles were compiled by John Adams, who based them on the British Naval Articles of 1749. The present Articles for the Government of the Navy were enacted by Congress on July 17, 1862. This statute consisted of the 1775 Articles revised and brought down to date and included the act of 1855 creating summary courts martial. In fact, the phraseology of many of the present articles is directly traceable to the British Articles of 1749. The Articles for the Government of the Navy have been amended several times since 1862, some of the most important amendments having been in 1893, 1895, 1909, 1916, and 1946.

While the present military and naval codes have a common origin and while in theory substance and administration they are fairly similar, there are, nevertheless, substantial differences between them, differences which are due to differences in operations and traditions of the services and due also to the fact that the great changes made in the Articles of War of 1920 were not incorporated in naval law.

The history of efforts to reform the court-martial systems of the services is almost as old as the Articles themselves. The major impetus to reform is well within our own memories and occurred principally after the two World Wars. As I have stated, a major reform occured in the Articles of War in 1920. This was due entirely to the pressure of criticism. The same type of criticism took place during and since World War II and, in response to it, the Army and Navy, both, introduced amendments to their basic statutes in the Eightieth Congress. These proposed amendments were largely the results of studies by a number of groups of prominent attorneys organized by the services themselves. It will be recalled that the Army had a post-war study of court-martial sentences by a committee headed by former Justice Owen Roberts and they also had a study of court-martial procedures by a committee of which Judge Arthur Vanderbilt was chairman. The Navy had committees under the chairmanship of Mr. Arthur Ballantine, Judge Matthew McGuire, and Mr. Arthur Keeffe.

All these various reports, which were made by these eminent committees after World War I, both as to Army and Navy courts martial, are very critical of the lack of uniformity in the two systems, the fact that men, even in the same service, but different theaters, have not been treated uniformly. The Government has gone to a great deal of expense in having these reports made, and reviewing all the courts-martial decisions. Of course, there has been a great deal of criticism and hard feeling, and a sense of unfairness of treatment on the part of many servicemen and their families who have had experience in courts martial.

The amendments proposed to the Articles of War were adopted, as you will recall, in Public Law 759 of the Eightieth Congress. In the Senate they became part of title II of the Selective Service Act by virtue of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM]. The Senator from Missouri brought about many needed reforms in the amendment adopted in the Eightieth Congress, most of which, as I shall point out later, have been reincorporated and kept in the uniform code which is now before the Senate.

In this connection, it will be recalled that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY], who has been greatly interested in this matter for years, urged a more comprehensive approach to the problem of court-martial reform. He did not feel it should be limited to the Army, but should include all the services. The Kem amendment in the Eightieth Congress being an amendment to the Selective Service Act, applied only to the Army and to the Air Force, and not to the Navy.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GURNEY] recommended that a single uniform code of military justice be drafted to end the continual piece-meal amendments to the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy. He spoke to Secretary Forrestal, who was then grappling with the difficult problems of the first year of unification. Secretary Forrestal agreed that a uniform code of military justice was not only one of the most logical areas of unification in the Military Establishment, but was one of the most necessary.

As a result of these discussions, Secretary Forrestal constituted in June of 1948 an interdepartmental committee in his office, and directed that they draft a uniform code of military justice for all the armed services. He appointed as chairman of this group the distinguished legal scholar, Prof. Edmund M. Morgan, of the Harvard University Law School, who is one of the most eminent authorities on the law of evidence. In case any graduates of Yale or Columbia Law Schools might resent the fact that a Harvard man was selected, I might state that Dr. Morgan previously taught at both Yale and Columbia Universities.

The Morgan committee labored all last summer and fall and submitted to Mr. Forrestal in February of this year a draft of the Uniform Code.

The Morgan committee made an intensive study of the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy and has not only succeeded in codifying the two laws, but, in many instances, has completely revised their provisions. That committee considered all the studies and recommendations that have been made in recent years and compiled an impressive bibliography of reference works. They faced a more difficult problem, however, than committees in the past in that in addition to making recommendations they were called upon to draft legislation and to do it on a uniform basis to apply to all services.

Mr. President, I have had an opportunity of examining the extensive findings and the report of the Morgan committee. It is one of the most remarkable studies and works I have ever seen. The committee considered every proposal and every viewpoint, and I think it has done a noteworthy work in getting together recommendations for a unified code, to which all the services have agreed, and which all the services recommend. I have here in my hand a copy of the Morgan report, which is only the report, not the testimony, and which is considerably thicker than a Sears, Roebuck catalog.

Heretofore, all studies have been made on a one-service basis and the many criticisms voiced against military law and procedures have not uniformly applied.

The Morgan committee, as I have said, was an interdepartmental committee. Mr. Gordon Gray, now Secretary of the Army, represented the Army. The then Under Secretary, John Kenney, represented the Navy, and Assistant Secretary Eugene Zuckert represented the Air Force.

Mr. Felix E. Larkin, general counsel of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, acted as executive secretary of the committee, and headed a working staff of some 15 lawyers from the Office of the Secretary of Defense and the Judge Advocate Generals' offices of the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Coast Guard.

Mr. Larkin, let me say, has devoted more than 2 years of study to this problem, and his assistance, both to the Armed Services Committee of the House and the Armed Services Committee of the Senate, has been a great contribution and of tremendous aid to us in the consideration of the pending bill.

This working committee gathered and processed all the material for the main committee.

The results of the work of this committee, exemplified by the proposed Uniform Code of Military Justice, are an outstanding accomplishment. Considering the difficulty of the subject matter, its complexity, and, in many cases, its highly technical nature, the committee achieved a remarkable degree of uniformity. Naturally, a number of the provisions are the result of a compromise and, naturally, there was no final agreement on a few of them and a decision had to be made by Secretary Forrestal.

I wish to say that in examining the attitude of the services on the various proposals which have been incorporated in the unified code which is here presented, there was agreement between the services on a remarkably large number of the proposals, I should say away above 90 percent. Only a very few had to be submitted to Secretary Forrestal for determination one way or another.

The bill was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, was carefully studied by them, and was approved by them as fully in accord with the program of the President. On February 8, 1949, Mr. Forrestal transmitted it simultaneously to the Senate and House, and it was introduced as S. 857 and H. R. 2498. Mr. Forrestal strongly supported the code, and Secretary Johnson has also informed our commitee of his strong support of the bill. He has listed this as urgent legislation in the interest of our National Defense Establishment, and in the interest of unification.

The House Committee on Armed Services, through a subcommittee, conducted extensive hearing for 6 days a week over a period of 5 weeks, during which time they heard a total of 28 witnesses. Their deliberations are contained in a transcript of 1,542 pages, a very full hearing, and the subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee made much use of the extensive hearings and statements of witnesses before the Armed Services Committee of the House.

As a result of this consideration, the House committee made a number of amendments to the bill, and reintroduced the original bill in the form of a clean bill, which became H. R. 4080. This bill was favorably reported to the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote of the House Committee on Armed Services and after debate passed the House by a voice vote, almost a unanimous vote, on May 5, 1949.

Let me say that any bill of this complicated nature which receives the unanimous vote of the distinguished members of the Armed Services Committee of the House, which I believe is composed of 26 or 27 members, must have been formulated very carefully.

The Senate Committee on Armed Services then undertook extensive hearings, and, in addition to Senate bill 857, which was the original bill introduced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, considered the House version, House bill 4080.

The committee heard witnesses from the major veterans organizations, the American Bar Association, the New York City Bar Association the New York County Lawyers Bar Association, and the War Veterans Bar Association. In addition, testimony was presented by numerous well-qualified witnesses and by representatives of the Department of Defense. The committee also had the benefit of Professor Morgan's views. He testified at considerable length and strongly supported the bill. The committee scrutinized with great care the entire code and carefully considered the amendments made by the House of Representatives. Since so much of the Code and so many of the House amendments seemed appropriate to us, it was decided to report to the Senate the House version of the bill, together with the amendments made by our committee.

The reason we did not use the House language, and why we did not strike out House language, when we had amendments to take the place of the House bill language, was that some rearranging and some substantial changes were made, so we decided to report the amendments together in lieu of the House bill, so that all the language of the House bill is stricken out.

In general, the amendments of our committee have been of a technical and clarifying nature. We have tightened the provisions on jurisdiction over persons who are subject to the code; we have scaled down some of the punishments that can be imposed by commanding officers as company punishment; we have increased the protections of double jeopardy; and we have redefined and clarified several of the punitive articles.

We have changed the tenure of the Court of Military Appeals, which is provided for in the bill.

We feel that a conscientious effort has been made by a large group of people who have worked a long time on this whole subject and, though necessarily not perfect, the code has a large number of advantages to recommend it. In that connection, I would like to quote from both Mr. Forrestal's letter of transmittal and a recent letter of Secretary Johnson.

Mr. Forrestal concluded his letter by stating:

I regard this proposed bill as an outstanding example of unification in the armed services. In my opinion, the proposed bill is well designed to protect the rights of those subject to it, will increase public confidence in military justice, and will not impair the performance of military functions. Accordingly, I strongly urge its passage by the Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Johnson's letter printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As you know, I requested Prof. Edmund M. Morgan to inform your committee of my support of the Uniform Code of Military Justice when he appeared before you on my behalf.

I would appreciate it if this letter is incorporated in the record of your hearings and the committee report, because I am anxious to reiterate my strong support of the uniform code.

The code was drafted and transmitted to the Congress before I assumed office. I have taken the time, however, to familiarize myself with its principal provisions and I concur in Mr. Forrestal's opinion that the code represents an outstanding example of unification in the armed services. In my opinion, the code provides a number of very desirable protections for the accused without interfering with necessary military functions. In addition it represents a great advance in military justice in that it provides the same law and the same procedures for all persons in the armed forces. By its terms, the same rights, privileges, and obligations will apply to Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard. I cannot emphasize too much the importance of this equality and the fact that I believe it will be an item which will enhance the teamwork and cooperative spirit of the services.

I am aware of the conscientious and objective work of your committee and the House committee. I know that the bill has been improved by these constructive efforts and I wish to express to you and the members of your committee my deep appreciation. In order that the benefits of the code may be available at the earliest possible time, I strongly urge its passage at the present session of the Congress.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the proposed code, for the first time in the history of the armed services in this country, provides a single law for the enforcement of discipline and the trial and punishment of offenders. It is uniformly applicable in all its parts to the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Coast Guard in time of war and peace.

The code is designed to supersede (a) the Articles of War, including the amendments contained in the Selective Service Act of 1948, (b) the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and (c) the Disciplinary Laws of the Coast Guard. As you know, there are at present no separate articles governing the Air Force or the Marine Corps. If passed, the code will be the sole statutory authority embodying both the substantive and the procedural law governing military justice and its administration. There will be the same law and the same procedure governing all personnel in the armed services. That this should be so is the settled conviction of most people, and I believe no argument is necessary to demonstrate its validity.

In the same way that all persons in this country are subject to the same Federal laws and triable by the same procedure in all Federal courts, so it will be in the armed forces. The original trial of an accused will be in a court of his own service, except in certain circumstances where he is a member of a force acting jointly with another. The departmental review will follow a similar course. But the procedure before trial, at the trial, and on review will be the same as if the case had occurred in any of the other armed forces. The final review on the law will be made by the same tribunal for all the Departments of the Military Establishment. The objective is to make certain not only that justice be done to the accused, but that there be no disparities between the services. A civilian lawyer will have no difficulty in conducting any case at any stage of the proceedings.

If adopted, the code will be the sole statutory authority for—

First. The infliction of limited disciplinary penalties for minor offenses without judicial action;

Second. The establishment of pretrial and trial procedure;

Third. The creation and constitution of there classes of courts martial corresponding to those now in existence;

Fourth. The eligibility of members of each of the courts and the qualifications of its officers and counsel;

Fifth. The review of findings and sentence and the creation and constitution of the reviewing tribunals; and Sixth. The listing and definition of offenses, redrafted and rephrased in modern legislative language.

The code, while based on the revised Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy, is a consolidation and a complete recodification of the present statutes. Under it, personnel of the armed forces, regardless of the Department in which they serve, will be subject to the same law and will be tried in accordance with the same procedures.

Among the provisions designed to secure uniformity are the following:

First. The offenses made punishable by the code are identical for all the armed forces.

Second. The same system of courts with the same limits of jurisdiction of each court is set up in all the armed forces.

Third. The procedure for general courts martial is identical as to institution of charges, pretrial investigation, action by the convening authority, review by the Board of Review, and review by the Court of Military Appeals in all the armed forces.

Fourth. The rules of procedure at the trial, including modes of proof, are equally applicable to all the armed forces.

Fifth. The Judge Advocate Generals of the three Departments are required to make uniform rules of procedure for the boards of review in each Department.

Sixth. The required qualifications for members of the court, law officer, and counsel are identical for all of the armed forces.

Seventh. The Court of Military Appeals, which finally decides questions of law, is the court of last resort for each of the armed forces and also acts with the Judge Advocates General of the three Departments as an advisory body with a view to securing uniformity in policy and in sentences and in discovering and remedying defects in the system and its administration.

The code, of course, has its foundation in the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy and incorporates a large number of the provisions of both of these statutes. In addition, it includes most of the provisions of the Articles of War as amended by Public Law 759 of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. President, in that connection let me say that the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] in many respects greatly improved the Articles of War, as I shall set forth later, by the amendment he offered to the Selective Service Act in the Eightieth Congress, which is known as the Kem amendment. The Armed Services Committee is greatly obligated to the distinguished Senator from Missouri for his suggestions to the bill, most of which have been adopted, and most of which were contained in his amendment to the Selective Service Act which was applicable to the Army and to the Air Force.

For example, the code provides—

First. For enlisted men on general and special courts for the trial of other enlisted men.

These are some of the amendments which were in the Kem amendment, and which were carried forth in the unified code.

Second. That officers be subject to trial by special courts martial.

Third. That censure or reprimand of the courts or their members by the convening authority is prohibited.

Fourth. That the accused have the right to counsel at pretrial investigation.

Fifth. That company officer punishment be extended to a larger class of officers.

The above provisions were not only retained, but are now applicable to all the armed services, whereas under Public Law 759 they applied to the Army and Air Force only.

Among the provisions designed to insure a fair trial are the following:

GENERAL COURTS MARTIAL

First. A pretrial investigation is provided, at which the accused is entitled to be present with counsel to cross-examine available witnesses against him and to present evidence in his own behalf. It has some features of preliminary hearing and some of pretrial discovery as used in the civil courts.

Second. A prohibition against referring any charge for trial which does not state an offense or is not shown to be supported by sufficient evidence.

Third. A mandatory provision for competent, legally trained counsel at the trial for both the prosecution and the defense.

Fourth. A prohibition against requesting any statement from the accused without warning, and against compelling self-incrimination, and against reception in evidence of improperly obtained statements.

Fifth. Provision for equal process to accused and prosecution for obtaining witnesses and depositions and a provision allowing only the accused to use depositions in a capital case.

Sixth. A provision giving an accused enlisted man the privilege of having enlisted men as members of the court trying his case.

Seventh. A provision whereby voting on challenges, findings, and sentence is by secret ballot of the members of the court.

Eighth. A provision requiring the law officer to instruct the court on the record concerning the elements of the offense, presumption of innocence, and the burden of proof.

Ninth. A provision for an automatic review of the trial record for errors of law and of fact by a board of review with the right of the accused to be represented by legally competent counsel.

Tenth. A provision for the review of the record for errors of law by the Court of Military Appeals. This review is automatic in the case where the sentence is death or affects a general or flag officer and is upon petition showing probable error of law where the sentence involves more than 1 year's confinement, with the right to be represented by competent counsel.

Eleventh. A prohibition against receiving pleas of guilty in capital cases.

SPECIAL COURTS MARTIAL

In addition to certain of the above provisions which also apply to special courts martial, there is provided as follows:

First. The trial counsel and defense counsel must be equally qualified.

Second. In cases where a bad-conduct discharge has been imposed, a full stenographic transcript must be taken and the case is reviewed in the same fashion as a general court-martial record.

Third. Peremptory challenge and voting by secret ballot is provided as in a general court martial.

Fourth. Review by judge advocate or legal officer is required.

SUMMARY COURTS MARTIAL

First. Provision is made for permitting an accused to refuse trial by summary court upon request.

Second. Review by a judge advocate or legal officer is required.

Among some of the provisions designed to prevent interference with the due administration of justice are the following:

First. The convening authority may not refer charges for trial until they have been examined by the staff judge advocate or legal officer and have been found legally sufficient.

Second. The staff judge advocate or legal officer is authorized to communicate directly with the Judge Advocate General.

Third. All counsel at a general court-martial trial are required to be lawyers and to be certified by the Judge Advocate General as qualified to perform their legal duties.

Fourth. The law officer—a competent lawyer—rules on all questions raised at the trial, except on a motion for a directed verdict and on the issue of the accused's sanity.

Fifth. The convening authority must not act on a finding or sentence of a general court martial without first obtaining the advice of his staff judge advocate or legal officer.

Sixth. The Board of Review, situated in the office of the Judge Advocate General and removed from the convening authority, is composed of legally trained men and reviews the trial record for errors of law and of fact.

Seventh. The Court of Military Appeals is composed of civilians and passes finally on all questions of law.

Eighth. When counsel appear before the Board of Review and the Court of Military Appeals, both parties must be represented by qualified lawyers.

Ninth. Censure by a commanding officer of a court martial or any member or officer thereof because of any judicial action of the court or any member or officer is forbidden and any attempt improperly to influence official action in any aspect of a trial or its review is prohibited.

The proposed legislation is presented in 15 section. Section 1 contains the Uniform Code, which is subdivided into 11 parts. Part I contains general provisions. Part II contains all of the provisions relating to apprehension and restraint. Part III pertains to nonjudicial punishment. Part IV sets forth the jurisdiction of courts martial. Part V prescribes the manner of appointment and composition of courts martial. Part VI prescribes pretrial procedure. Part VII prescribes trial procedure. Part VIII relates to sentences by courts martial. Part IX prescribes the provisions for appellate review. Part X sets forth the punitive articles, which define the various offenses. Part XI contains miscellaneous provisions. Section 1 of the bill contains 140 articles. These articles embrace all of the provisions of the proposed Uniform Code of Military Justice. The 14 remaining sections relate to the subject of military justice, but are not appropriately part of a code of military justice and are, therefore, not included therein.

I believe that a summary of the contents of each part of the Uniform Code will indicate to you the scope of this legislation and will enable me to high light for you those articles which are incorporations of present provisions and practices of the Army and the Navy, those which are incorporations of the amendment of 1948 to the Articles of War, and those articles which are new:

Part I of the code concerns itself with general provisions which are usually found in modern penal laws. This part contains, in addition to definitions, the general jurisdictional provisions of military law. There is little in this part which is entirely new.

Article 2 sets forth the persons subject to the code and, in general, reincorporates the provisions in the present law. A new provision worthy of comment is found in subdivision 3, which makes Reserve personnel while on inactive-duty training subject to court-martial jurisdiction. Under the Articles of War, Reserve personnel on inactive duty are not subject to military law at the present time. The Articles for the Government of the Navy, however, are applicable to members of the Naval Reserve when they are on active duty; authorized training duty, with or without pay; drill or other equivalent instructions or duty or while they are in uniform. The provision set forth in the code strikes a middle ground between the present lack of jurisdiction of the Army and the extensive jurisdiction of the Navy, but it was felt necescut down and restrict the broad jurisdiction of the Navy, but it was felt unnecessary to retain jurisdiction over Reserve personnel on inactive duty under circumstances where they are engaging in certain types of training—notably week end flight training or sea duty. Under present Reserve training programs, reservists frequently partake of inactive-duty training over week ends and during the course of that training use expensive and dangerous equipment. That refers to airplanes, tanks, and equipment of that sort. It is felt necessary that, under such circumstances, there be control over such training. To insure, however, that reservists on inactive duty are not generally subject to courts martial, this provision has been carefully drafted so that it will apply only when reservists are authorized to undertake such training by written orders which are voluntarily accepted by them and which specify that they become subject to the code. Some Reserve groups were alarmed that this would make them subject to the code when they attended monthly meetings or wear their uniform or receive correspondence courses. The jurisdiction is not intended to cover such occasions, and will not cover them, both because of the requirement that the orders be voluntarily accepted and because no such acceptance will be requested except in connection with duty which involves the use of dangerous and expensive equipment.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have been following with interest the distinguished Senator's statement on the application of the jurisdiction of courts martial to reservists not on active duty. I would like to be sure, and I should like to have the RECORD state with certainty, just what is intended by that provision. Is it correct to assume that under the wording which is now included in the bill there is no intention whatever of covering within the jurisdiction of courts martial, reservists who, while required to wear uniforms during training, are not assigned to the handling of expensive and dangerous equipment?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am delighted that the able Senator from Florida has asked the question, because it is a subject which I think should be amplified to some extent.

Under the present Articles for the Government of the Navy, as the Senator so well knows, when a naval reservist wears his uniform to attend a meeting, for example, he is subject to the provisions of the Articles for the Government of the Navy. It is a very tight kind of provision. The Army reservist, on the other hand, is not subject to such a provision. The proposal attempts to strike a happy balance between those two situations. The subject is covered both in the House committee report and in the report of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate.

I should like to read from page 10 of the House committee report:

Paragraph (3) is adapted from 34 U. S. C., section 855, and, in its present form, represents a committee amendment. It should be noted that before Reserve personnel can be subject to this code they must voluntarily accept written orders for inactive-duty training, which orders specify that they are subject to the code.

A similar provision is set forth in the Senate committee report. As chairman of the subcommittee, I wish to make it clear that reservists wearing their uniforms in a period of training or attending a course or a lecture, or something of that kind, are not intended to be covered by the code. It is intended that they be covered by the code only when they report for duty involving the use of dangerous equipment, such as an airplane. I think the Senator will agree that under such conditions reservists should be subject to the military code. They are given orders, and they must accept the orders in writing, specifying that they are subject to the code. If they do not accept the orders, they are not subject to the code.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Before I yield further, I should like to read into the RECORD an excerpt from the report of the Morgan committee on this subject:

Paragraph (3) is adapted from 34 U. S. C., section 855. The requirement that there be written orders is added for two reasons. First, the applicability of this code to personnel on inactive-duty training is desirable only with respect to certain types of training, such as week-end flight training, and the written orders will be used to distinguish the types. Secondly, the orders will be notice to the personnel concerned.

I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it fair to say that no such orders will be issued in the case of officers and men who are assigned to duty other than to air flight duty, of which the Senator has spoken?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should not like to limit it to air flight duty. I should say sea duty or duty requiring the use of dangerous and expensive equipment. However, I should say it would be principally air flight duty and sea duty.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it fair to say that such orders are not expected to be issued, nor required to be accepted, by personnel of the Infantry Corp, the Field Artillery Corps, the Anti-Aircraft Artillery, the Corps of Engineers, the Hospital and Sanitary Corps, or officers and men of various other corps other than the Air Corps and the Navy?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Florida that it is my information, and I am sure the representatives of the Army, the Air Corps, and the Navy have so testified, that the Army did not expect to use it at all, or certainly not in the instances to which the Senator has referred; that the Air Corps expects to present written orders and to ask for their acceptance only in the use of airplanes in flight duty, and the Navy only in the case of sea duty.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. If I correctly understand the Senator's last answer, it is that there is no expectation on the part of the Army to make use of this feature of the law in any way whatever.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is my information.

Mr. HOLLAND. I understand that the expectation to use it is confined to the Air Force and the Navy, and then only, in the case of the Air Force, when air flight duty is required, in the use of expensive and dangerous equipment; and in the case of the Navy, only when afloat, or in air fight duty in the use of expensive and dangerous equipment.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is my understanding, and I shall say for the subcommittee that that is the testimony that was given to us, and that is the legislative history of the provision.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it correct that even when used in those cases, the order of the Air Force or of the Navy, as the case may be, must be brought to the attention of, and delivered to, the particular officer or enlisted individual who is involved, and must be accepted by him in writing before it is applicable to him?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask a question in regard to subsection (11) of article 2, to which the Senator has just made reference. It appears on page 108 of the bill. Am I correct in interpreting subsection (11) to mean that a wife who accompanies her husband, who is a member of the armed forces, to a point outside the continental limits of the United States, would be subject to this code?

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the wife accompanies her husband outside the continental limits of the United States and outside the Territories listed in subsection (11), on page 108, she will be subject to the uniform code as presented in this bill, just as she is subject to the military code today.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator whether any exceptions are made in respect to the Territories listed in the last three and one-third lines of the paragraph.

Mr. KEFAUVER. In line 17, on page 108, I think it would be clearer if the word "without" had been inserted between the words "and" and "the." I have no objection to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. KEM. Is it not necessary that such an amendment be made, if the interpretation the Senator has suggested be given to that paragraph?

Mr. KEFAUVER. With the permission of the Senator, I shall read the paragraph; it is short. I read now subsection (11) of article 2, on page 108 of the bill:

(11) Subject to the provisions of any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law, all persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the armed forces without the continental limits of the United States and—

And at that point the word "without" should be inserted—

the following Territories: That part of Alaska east of longitude 172° west, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

It is intended to except those Territories or at least all the Territories except where we have a force. The Aleutian Islands are not excepted. They are not excepted now. That is the reason for the reference to longitude.

Mr. KEM. The point I have in mind is this: Does not the Senator from Tennessee agree that in order to make that interpretation clear, it would be essential to insert in line 17 the additional word "without", or something to that effect? In other words, does the Senator mean that the committee intends to amend the language by inserting the word "without", in line 17? If that is done, it seems to me the interpretation the Senator places on the language there is correct. But in the absence of such a change, it seems to me it is at least doubtful whether such an interpretation will be correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I say to the Senator from Missouri that probably such a change would make the language clearer, although I did not think it was needed. But certainly I have no objection to it, and I agree with the Senator that it will make the meaning clearer.

So, Mr. President, I shall submit as a committee amendment the insertion of the word "without" between the word "and" and the word "the", in line 17, on page 108 of the bill.

Mr. KEM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I appreciate greatly the Senator's suggestion in that respect.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If the amendment just referred to is made, should not a similar amendment be made in subparagraph (12), at the top of page 109?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct; it should be made in line 3, on page 109. On behalf of the subcommittee, I shall offer the same amendment at that point.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question which I hope will be a clarifying question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am delighted to yield to the able Senator from Massachusetts, who worked so long and who knows much more about this proposal than does the junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I hope the Senator's other statements are of greater veracity than his last one. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEFAUVER. The statement represents the conviction of the Senator from Tennessee about the matter.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. My question is this: Some doubt has been raised, particularly by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, relative to civilians and the inclusion of civilians under subparagraphs (11) and (12) of article 2. It is my understanding that subparagraph (11), with the exception of the change from the word "territorial" to the word "continental," is the same language as that now contained in the Army code; that subparagraph (12) is now in the code of the Navy in wartime; that what subparagraphs (11) and (12) really do is to cover in peacetime, as well as in wartime, civilians who accompany the Army, the Navy, or the Air Force; and that it is necessary to include subparagraph (12) for application in peacetime as well as in wartime, for the Navy particularly, because of its trusteeship over some of the islands in the far Pacific, where there is no other code of justice. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Senator is correct; that is a correct statement.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So that when the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary argues that the matter should be brought to his committee because of these provisions, he is incorrect, in that they are already a substantial part of the present military code. Is that not correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is correct. That will be found in the report of the House committee, which, under the Ramseyer rule, was to report on the whole law as the law is to be amended, as the Senator well knows. On page 42 of the House report, subsection (d) of article 1, applies to the Army. Then there is, under the Ramseyer rule, a similar provision in the House report as to the Navy. I thank the Senator for clarifying that issue.

Article 3 represents a new provision in military law. It provides a type of continuing jurisdiction over persons who have been separated from military service or are on inactive duty, who, nevertheless, are charged with having committed offenses while in an active-duty status. Under the Articles of War, persons who commit serious crimes overseas, such as murder, theft of crown jewels, or mistreatment of American prisoners, or who commit a military offense in this country, may not be tried by court martial or in any court after they have been discharged from the service. Moreover, Army reservists may not be tried for such crimes after they go on inactive duty. In a recent Supreme Court case, the case of United States ex rel. Hirshberg v. Cooke, Commanding Officer (226 U. S. 210), it was held that a person discharged from the naval service cannot be tried by court martial during a subsequent reenlistment for a crime committed during the first enlistment, even though in this case it was 1 day only that he was out of the service. But the same principle would apply if he had been out of the service for 20 minutes only. Of course, the crime committed in the Hirshberg case was not discovered until after the reenlistment, and that, of course, could happen very readily.

By virtue of these inadequate provisions, a considerable number of persons were able to escape trial for serious offenses committed while in the armed services, and it was apparent to the Senate committe that this situation should be corrected. The House committee was of the same opinion. There is in the House hearings a great deal of discussion about abuses which have resulted from this holding by the Supreme Court. It was felt, however, that the jurisdiction of courts martial should not, in general, be extended to civilians, and for this reason the continuing jurisdiction provided over the types of cases I have described is limited to cases which fall, first, within the statute of limitations; second, which are not triable by Federal courts; and, third, which involve serious crimes calling for a sentence of at least 5 years. In other words, there is continuing jurisdiction only in those cases. This provision would, therefore, correct the inadequate jurisdiction heretofore provided and, at the same time, limit and restrict the jurisdiction to proper areas.

Article 4 is a noteworthy change for the Army and Air Force in that it provides that in cases where an officer is dismissed by the President without trial and in the event he is later exonerated he may be restored to active duty. Article 6 extends to the Navy the provisions passed by the Congress at the last session by the Kem amendment, requiring assignments for duty of judge advocates and legal officers to be subject to the approval of the appropriate Judge Advocate General and requiring consultation by convening authorities with staff judge advocates or legal officers in matters relating to the administration of military justice. It also emphasizes the independence of the staff judge advocate or legal officer in matters relating to military justice by authorizing him to communicate directly with the staff judge advocates or legal officers of superior or subordinate commands or with the Judge Advocate General himself.

Part II, which consists of articles 7 through 14, covers the general subject of apprehension and restraint. It is new only to the extent that the conflicting definitions of the terms used and the different processes have been simplified and made more orderly. Attention is drawn, specifically, to article 12, which continues the provision enacted by the Eightieth Congress prohibiting confinement of members of the armed forces with enemy prisoners.

Part III consists of one article only, article 15 which deals with nonjudicial punishment imposable by commanding officers. This is commonly called company punishment in the Army, and punishment at mast in the Navy. As will be noticed, the article lists all the punishments now so imposable by both the Army and the Navy, with certain modifications which I shall explain. The present practice of the Army differs from that of the Navy. The permitted punishments are different. That is necessary, of course, by virtue of their different operations. The Army practice has been to impose less severe penalties and to give the accused an option to demand trial by court martial. The Navy has imposed somewhat more severe punishments and has given the accused no option. This diversity in practice is due to two factors: first, men on shipboard are necessarily in a different situation with reference to freedom of motion and availability of replacement than men in camp; second, in the Navy mast punishment is imposed by the Captain, and a summary court necessarily consists of an officer inferior to him in rank, while in the Army such an incongruity in rank between a commanding officer and a summary court would be virtually unknown since the court normally would be appointed by a higher command. The committee concluded that these factors justified a difference in treatment. Consequently, article 15, first, subjects the imposition of these nonjudicial penalties to complete regulation by the President, and, second, gives the Secretary of each Department discretionary power to put additional limitations upon them and to provide for an option to the accused to demand a court martial. In addition, the committee felt that the more severe penalties of the Navy, involving confinement for 7 days and bread and water for 5 days, should be imposed only at sea where there is reason and justification for their application. For this reason, the language, as originally submitted, was modified and the imposition of bread and water was reduced from 5 to 3 days. One further provision of interest in this article is subsection (d) which strengthens the present system of appeals from nonjudicial punishment and permits reviewing authorities not only to remit the unexecuted portion of punishment, but to restore rights adversely affected.

Part IV in its article 16 creates three classes of courts martial—general, special, and summary. These correspond to the present courts in the Army. The special court martial under present Navy practice is called a summary court, and the summary court is called a deck court. The chief difference from the present Army provision is the requirement that a general court shall consist of at least five members and a law officer.

Most of the articles consist of a rewording and revision of provisions found at present in both the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy. Article 17, however, is new in that it provides reciprocal jurisdiction of courts martial. By its terms, each armed force shall have court-martial jurisdiction over all persons subject to the Uniform Code. There is thus provided authority for an Army court martial to try either its own personnel or the personnel of the Navy, the Air Force, or the Coast Guard. It is felt that this provision is necessary in the light of unification and by virtue of the tendency to have military operations undertaken by joint forces. Inasmuch as it is not possible at this time to forecast the different forms of joint operation which will take place in the future, the exercise of the reciprocal jurisdiction of one armed force over the personnel of other services has been left to the regulations of the President. In this way a desirable flexibility is attained which will enable the President to prescribe the types of operations in which reciprocal jurisdiction will be exercised. Of course, until the President authorizes reciprocal jurisdiction it cannot be put into effect, but in certain things like the MATS there were joint operations. I think it should be pointed out at this place, however, that even though the original trial may be conducted by another service, the review authority will be from the serviceman's own service.

Part V, which has to do with the appointment and composition of courts martial, includes articles 22 through 29. These fix the qualifications of the persons who may convene general, special, and summary courts and the persons who may serve on courts martial.

Articles 22, 23, and 24 continue the present practices of the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Coast Guard in that they provide members of general, special, and summary courts martial be appointed by the President, the Secretaries of the three Departments, and certain commanding officers. This, as I have said, is a continuation of the present methods of selecting members of courts martial and is now provided in Articles of War 8, 9, and 10 and in Articles for the Government of the Navy 26, 38, and 64. I believe it is advisable at this point to stop and outline for the members of the Senate the controversy which exists in connection with the provisions of these three articles. Certain witnesses before our committe and the House committee opposed this method of selecting court members and claimed that it is the one serious defect of the Uniform Code, in that it enables a continuance of command control, which, in their opinion, deprives courts martial of their independence. The witnesses who espouse this viewpoint are representatives of some of the bar associations in this country. I may say, parenthetically, that the position of the bar associations on this subject is not unanimous. The New York State Bar Association, for instance, strongly supports the provisions as written. The critics of these provisions concede that the commanding officer should retain the right to refer charges for trial, select the trial counsel, and review the sentence after trial. They would, however, take away from the commanding officer the right to appoint the members of the court. In substitution therefor, they would have court members and defense counsel selected by a staff judge advocate from a panel of eligible officers made available and selected by commanding officers. It is their view that this method of selecting court members would remove the influence of the commanding officer over the members of the court.

The committee considered this proposal at great length, having heard a great deal of testimony on the subject, and rejected it. The House committee came to the same conclusions after considerable study. This idea of a panel of court members is not a new one. It was part of the Chamberlain bill for the reorganization of the Articles of War in 1919 and was proposed last year by the same bar association witnesses when Congress considered the Kem amendment, which became law as Public Law 759.

I know that representatives of many associations urged the Senator from Missouri to adopt the idea.

The Department of Justice opposes the idea of a panel of prospective court members on the grounds that it is impractical, unwieldy, and will not achieve the result claimed for it. The proposal was submitted to and considered by the Morgan committee and was rejected by them. Professor Morgan so testified before our committee. It is the position of the National Military Establishment that the uniform code has a number of added protections for the accused not found in the Articles of War or the Articles for the Government of the Navy which will guarantee a greater amount of justice and will provide a more legal proceeding which will effectively counteract any unwarranted command influence. They give a strong warning that completely divorcing command responsibility from command authority will impair military functions. We concluded that, recognizing necessary military participation, there were a sufficient number of protections in the bill to justify the present method of selecting courts.

Another thing which should be pointed out, Mr. President, is that of having a panel available for various courts martial, which would immobilize or take out of operation that number of officers and men. It would be unwieldy to have such a panel available for that purpose. It does not seem to add very much protection to have the commanding officer select the panel, in the first place, and then have members of the court selected from that panel. The committee could not see that it gave a great deal of protection. The other considerations outweigh it.

Article 25 provides for the service of enlisted men on courts which try enlisted men and follows the provisions of Public Law 759 of the Eightieth Congress. Article 26 provides for a law officer on general courts martial. It is generally agreed that every general court martial should have assigned to it an officer with legal training and experience who will make rulings on interlocutory questions and advise the court on matters of law. There has been some controversy, however, as to the status of this officer—as to whether he is to be a member of the court who retires and votes with the court on the findings and sentence, or whether he is to be more in the nature of a judge with completely independent functions.

Article 26 adopts the second view and provides for the appointment of what is called a law officer. He can neither vote on the findings and sentence nor retire with the court during its deliberations. In this way he differs from the law member now provided for in the Articles of War. He is an innovation for the Navy, which has never had either a law officer or a law member attached to its courts.

The judge concept, as contrasted with the member concept, has been supported by all the recent studies of the naval court-martial system. It was recommended by the House Military Affairs Committee in a study made of the Army system in 1946. It has been supported by many of the witnesses appearing before the Senate committee, including the witnesses for the bar associations. Just a few months ago it was fully adopted in Great Britain pursuant to a report of the Army and Air Force Courts-Martial Committee. There the law official did not have a vote, but prior to the report he was allowed to retire with the court during its deliberations.

There are two strong arguments for the system adopted in the bill. The first is that the withholding from the law officer of the functions of a juror makes him better able to carry out his judicial functions objectively. The second is that all instructions given by the law officer will be on the record and subject to review. This eliminates the situation in which, if erroneous advice on the law is given by the law member in closed session, there would be no record of the error on which to base an appeal.

In support of the member concept it has been said that the presence of a trained legal expert in the closed sessions is of great value in assuring that justice is done. In answer to this it should be pointed out that under article 51 the court will have the benefit of the law officer's instructions on the elements of the offense, the presumption of innocence, and the burden of proof, and that the same article does not prevent him from giving further instructions on other appropriate matters.

Article 27 contains one of the most important safeguards provided in this bill.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. As I understand, under article 26 the law officer is not permitted to retire with the other members of the court, or to vote. Is that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. KEM. Under that provision, is not the court deprived of the counsel and advice of the law officer when it might be most needed?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the distinguished Senator that there are two views in regard to that question. The Navy has never had a law member or a law officer. Under the Army system, the law member would retire with the court and would advise the court and vote with it. So this is a compromise between the Navy procedure and the Army procedure, but it so happens that it represents the recommendation, I think, contained in most of the studies of persons who have gone into the problem.

Answering more directly the question of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, it seems to me that following the jury concept in the matter is a pretty safe thing to do. The law officer is distinguished from a member of the court, and he must be a lawyer. He instructs the court on the record. If the court desires additional instructions it has a right to call him in, and the additional instructions are also on the record. The facts of the case are decided by the nonlegal members of the court.

There have been many complaints, as the Senator well knows, regarding the law member retiring with the court, with no record being made of what he says. Other persons feel that with his superior knowledge of the law he might unduly sway the members of the court against the person who is being tried.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator recall the testimony of Maj. Gen. Thomas H. Green, who was the Judge Advocate General of the Army when he appeared before the Senate subcommittee?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. KEM. The testimony to which I refer appears at page 257 of the hearings.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; I remember that he appeared before the subcommittee.

Mr. KEM. The portion of General Green's testimony to which I should like to invite the Senator's particular attention is as follows:

> The requirement of the Kem amendment that a law member be a lawyer and that he participate in all proceedings of a court martial is regarded by all who have had experience in the administration of military justice as the most significant improvement since automatic appellate review. The limitation on the effectiveness of the law member will result in miscarriages of justice both to the detriment of accused persons as well as to the detriment of the interests of the Government.

Does the Senator agree with that statement of Major General Green?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is the view of General Green, of course, but there is one point which I should make, namely, that the Kem amendment did not as a matter of fact require that the law member be a lawyer. It said, "if available."

Mr. KEM. Of course the amendment did not contemplate that the officers be directed to accomplish the impossible. If there were not a lawyer available, of course, they could not have one.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I think that exception resulted in not having a lawyer as a law member, on the ground that he was not available, when many times a lawyer would have been available, but they did not want to have him serve.

Mr. KEM. But that is not in issue here.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is not in issue. This is merely getting a little closer to the civilian approach in court-martial proceeding. It approaches the judge idea. I think in its general tendency and general aim the pending bill, while not going overboard in attempting to adopt civilian technique, is an attempt to bring the system a little further into harmony with civilian methods. This method of having the law officer instruct, and what he says appear on the record, and not retire and not vote with the court, is exactly what is done in civilian trials before juries today.

Mr. KEM. Does the Senator recall the language which Major General Green used in dealing with the proposed analogy between the law officer and a civilian judge?

I invite his attention to page 257 of the hearings, where it appears that General Green said:

> The analogy between the proposed law officer and a civilian judge is more apparent than real. For example, he rules subject to objection by any member of the court on the question of a motion for a finding of not guilty under article 51. Suppose that he has ruled, as a matter of law, that the prosecution has not proved a prima facie case and a member objects to his ruling. Under the proposed code the court closes—excludes the law officer—and votes on this legal question. The law officer cannot explain his ruling, defend it, or vote to sustain it. Although under A. W. 31 such a ruling by the present law member is also subject to objection at least he can defend his ruling against the argument of a member who may not be well versed in the law. I don't believe this change which makes the law member a mere figurehead is defensible.

Mr. KEFAUVER. This change does not make him a mere figurehead. General Green is wrong in saying that the law member cannot sustain his ruling.

Mr. KEM. He cannot sustain it when an important decision is being made by the court.

Mr. KEFAUVER. He certainly explains his ruling to the members of the court. He can be as emphatic as he desires. Of course, he cannot go into secret sessions and press the matter further.

Mr. KEM. How can he anticipate what course the argument and the discussion by the court will take when they retire?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I believe the Senator is talking about the facts of the case. Of course, if we are going to say that the position of the law member should prevail, that he ought to be able to retire with the board and argue with them in private, without what he says being on the record, in a closed session, we might as well abolish the other members of the court. At present he has only one vote in any event, and it seems that the general view of the Keeffe Board, and of all the other boards, is that we would have at least a better decision on the facts of a case if he acted as in the nature of a judge, rather than as a member.

Mr. KEM. Does not the Senator feel that the court is being deprived of the services of a law officer when the court most needs them?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It depends on the concept. It may be that the judge should retire with the jury and discuss the case during the deliberations. Perhaps courts martial really need a judge to help them decide a case. But we have never operated on that basis in civilian courts. The pending proposal tries to place courts martial on more of a civilian basis.

Mr. KEM. As General Green says, the analogy between the civilian court and the military court is more apparent than real.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say also that I have gone over the reports which have been filed relating to naval courts martial, in which there is no law member. There has not been a law member even to instruct on the law, not to say argue with the members when they are reaching their decisions, and they have accomplished justice just about as well as the Army and the Air Corps have under the present system.

Mr. KEM. I do not know about that. I think that all during the last war the Members of Congress received about as many complaints about the character of justice rendered in the Navy as in the Army.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri—and I think the Senator from Tennessee will support me—that we discusesd this matter at great length in the subcommittee hearings. We discussed it with Professor Morgan, and I believe our feeling was, after hearing both sides of the argument, that it would be very much more helpful, and in the end would be fairer to the defendant and fairer to the court, to have a lawyer member outside and not going in with the court. The court could always get the legal point of view restated by the lawyer member if it so desired, and have it placed on the record. It was felt that with the new court of appeals, composed of civilians, up at the top, it would be very much wiser and fairer to have the legal side of the differences of opinion all on the record, than to have the lawyer member saying things in private to the court when they were giving the matter their consideration. It was that balance of judgment, the weighing of both those things, which made me, as one member of the committee, feel that the committee's report was correct.

Mr. KEM. Is the Senator proceeding on the theory that the advice and counsel of the lawyer member would be unsound, or that he would overpower the judgment of the other members of the court?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It is on the same ground on which the distinguished Senator and I have never been permitted to serve on a jury, the idea being, as I understand it, that a trained lawyer sitting on a jury is likely to influence the jury. He may have different points of view from the judge who directed the jury, and therefore it is wise to exclude him. If we are to accept the analogy of the civilian court, I agree that is entirely so, but if we are going to accept that analogy, we would by the same token have to find many faults with the pending bill. I use that analogy in this instance because it was the thing which determined me as one member of the committee, and I think determined the judgment of the committee as a whole.

Mr. KEM. Is not the Senator like the devil who quotes Scripture to his purpose? Is he not insisting on the analogy when it serves his purpose and disregarding it entirely when it does not?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If the Senator from Massachusetts can quote Scripture for any purpose, at any time, he is very happy.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. KEM. I do not like to bear on the point unduly, but it seems to me that the experience which the Army had during the period in which the law officer, as he is termed now—or "law member," as it was in the other bill—was permitted to participate in the proceedings, was good. The testimony is that it was highly beneficial, and that it worked well in practice. Having tried that and found it good, I dislike to see the Congress abandon the principle and adopt something new and untried.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, there was controversy about this proposal. The committee did have some difficulty in reaching a decision. We hope the method we propose will work better than did the old method. We believe the one particular advantage our proposal has over the procedure whereby the law officer retires with the members of the court into executive session, is that whatever the law officer says will be on the record, so that the reviewing authorities may see what his attitude about the matter was and what he had to say about it. If the law officer retires into executive session with the members of the court, and talks back and forth with them, and votes with them, it is going to be very hard to have on the record his exact position, for purposes of the reviewing officers.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. The official position of the Army before the Morgan committee was that the law officer should be permitted to participate in the deliberations.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KEM. And the official position of the Navy was to the contrary?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Navy has never had either a law officer or a law member.

Mr. KEM. And the position of the Navy was that the law officer should not participate in the deliberations.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have been advised that the Navy and Air Force both voted for a law officer.

Mr. KEM. The Navy's position was that the law officer should not participate in the deliberations after the court retired.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I think the Navy's position was that it did not want one in the first place.

Mr. KEM. But the Navy voted for one, the Senator says. After having accepted him, the Navy did not want him to participate. Is that correct?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Navy and the Air Force, as I have been advised, voted for the law officer concept.

Mr. KEM. Was it the position of the Air Force that the law officer, or law member, whichever the Senator may choose to call him, should participate in the deliberations of the court?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have been consulting with some of the staff with respect to the position taken by the Army and the Navy and the Air Force in the matter. I think I made a misstatement a little while ago. My present information is that the Army and the Air Force wanted a law officer to retire with and vote with the court.

Mr. KEM. Then the voting was 2 to 1 in the armed services, and yet the committee has accepted and adopted the view of the minority?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The vote was really 2 to 2, because the chairman of the committee voted with the Navy.

Mr. KEM. The committee did not give him the same weight as it did to the large number of officers in one of the branches of the armed services, did it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Anyway, the services did stand 2 to 1.

Mr. KEM. Would it not be sounder for the Congress to adopt the view of the majority rather than the minority in this important matter?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that this is a compromise between the concept, on the one side, of the Navy, which had no law member at all, and that of the Army and Air Force, on the other side, which have a law member. So the compromise provides a law officer for each of the services.

Mr. KEM. Is it not true that the Army and the Air Force both had had experience with the law member and knew what that procedure was like, and to what use the law member could be put, and they liked that procedure and wanted to continue it? The Navy did not know any thing about it and objected to that about which they knew nothing.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Navy had had experience without the law officer, and they thought they had gotten along very well on that basis.

Mr. KEM. The mere fact that the committee was sitting shows that the Navy had not gotten along too well.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to make a comment in connection with the question asked by the Senator from Missouri, and I hope it may be helpful. There were only two instances in the whole report, as I understand, where the services were not in unanimous agreement. In those two instances Secretary Forrestal made the decision. He made the decision after hearing both sides, and after listening to Professor Morgan. He made the decision in the way it came to the committee. The committee went through the same process again, discussed the question, and after having listened to the discussion and after having listened to the recommendations made by Professor Morgan, came to the same conclusion Mr. Forrestal had reached. That is my memory and my understanding regarding how we reached the decision. We did not reach it on the basis of the minority presentation. We reached it on the decision made by Secretary Forrestal, when there was a difference of opinion between the services.

Mr. KEM. Of course, Secretary Forrestal had recently retired from the position of Secretary of the Navy and was in the corner of the Navy, so to speak. He had had no more experience with the law member than the other representatives of the Navy. On the other hand, the representatives of the Army and the Air Force had seen the procedure in operation for something like a year.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say also to the Senator that the old Military Affairs Committee of the House had some time back recommended the law officer concept. That committee at that time had jurisdiction over the Army and the Air Force only. Anyway, the problem was one of the difficult problems with which the committee had to deal, and the provision in the bill represents the compromise arrived at.

Article 27 contains one of the most important safeguards provided in the bill. This is the requirement that both the trial counsel and the defense counsel in a general court martial case shall be lawyers. It is in line with the recommendations of the Keeffe Board and of the House Committee on Military Affairs and is a provision that has been strongly supported by the bar associations and favored in a poll of the members of the Judge Advocates Association. It was unanimously recommended by the Morgan committee.

The existing Navy law has no provision with respect to the qualifications of counsel and naval courts and boards, or regulations which govern the procedures before naval courts martial. It merely provides that the accused has a right to counsel. The Articles of War, as amended by the Kem amendment of 1948, provide that lawyers must act for the prosecution and the defense, but this requirement is binding only if lawyers are available. It has been held that the determination of the availability of the lawyers is a matter entirely within the discretion of the convening authority, a discretion which can be and has been abused.

This committee is strongly of the opinion that absolute requirement that legally trained counsel conduct the prosecution and defense is one of the strongest and, at the same time, most practical and workable guaranties that trials will be conducted in accordance with due process of law.

Part VI contains the provisions governing pretrial procedure, and, in the main, the articles in this part follow present Army practice as prescribed in the Kem amendment of 1948. Article 31, as amended by the committee, fully guarantees the privilege against self-incrimination and contains a provision requiring that an accused must be informed of this privilege before he is interrogated. Article 32 provides for an impartial investigation of charges before trial by general court martial is ordered. The accused has a right to be present at this investigation, to be represented by counsel, to cross-examine witnesses against him, to have witnesses questioned in his behalf, and to present anything he may desire in his own behalf.

This investigation has elements of both an indictment and a discovery proceeding. The formal collection and presentation of evidence serves as a basis for determining whether a general court martial should be ordered and thus prevents frivolous or unfounded charges from going to trial. At the same time, it gives the accused a more complete knowledge of the nature of the case against him, enabling him better to prepare his defense. Incidentally more protection is given to an accused in a court martial investigation than is given to a civilian in a grand jury investigation, because a civilian cannot be present when a grand jury deliberates and votes.

Part VII, articles 36–54, covers trial procedure and follows closely the present Army and Navy practices. A good many of the provisions, however, now make uniform a number of minor differences which have heretofore existed. Article 37 continues the provision passed by the Congress in 1948 prohibiting unlawful influence on the actions of court martial. The committee believed it most desirable to continue this salutary prohibition, which will do much to eliminate so-called command control.

Reverting again for a minute to the question of command control, it is believed that article 37, which was brought in by the Kem amendment, coupled with article 98, will be a most effective weapon against any interference with the independence of the court by a commander. Not only is a commander prohibited from admonishing or reprimanding a court or its members under the provisions of article 37, but it becomes a court martial offense for him to do so under article 98.

Article 41, which provides one peremptory challenge of members of general and special courts, follows present Army practice, but changes Navy practice, which heretofore had no provision for peremptory challenges. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Missouri that the Army won over the Navy on this change.

Another example of uniformity is found in article 51, which covers the question of voting and rulings. As set out by the provisions of the article, the law officer now becomes more nearly an impartial judge in the manner of civilian courts. In addition to ruling on interlocutory questions of law during the course of the trial, the law officer is now required to instruct the court, on the record, before it retires as to the elements of the offense and to charge the court on presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and burden of proof. In article 52, you will notice that the number of votes required for both conviction and sentence have been made uniform for all the services.

Article 44 deals with former jeopardy. The distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] wrote the committee a lengthy letter in which he made a great many suggestions. Some of his suggestions dealt with this subject, and many of them were adopted by the committee. The committee heard considerable objection to the jeopardy rules as they exist in the services today and has amended them in line with the recommendations of the Senator from Nevada.

This has been done in such a way as not to interfere with the highly desirable system of automatic review under which every court-martial case is reviewed for error by higher authority whether or not the accused requests it. Article 44, as amended, not only protects a person from being tricd twice for the same offense, but also makes it clear that a case which is terminated by the prosecution for failure of available evidence or witnesses shall be a complete trial in the jeopardy sense. In other words, in a court-martial proceeding, if the trial is merely called off or delayed because the prosecution believes it does not have sufficient witnesses and wants an adjournment in order to obtain additional witnesses, another trial would constitute double jeopardy. If the trial is called off because of imperious necessity—for example, because of the advance of the enemy or because of bombardment—to continue with the trial would not constitute double jeopardy. I believe the doctrine of imperious necessity under another name is recognized in civilian-court practice.

Part VIII, articles 55 to 58, deals with sentences and has nothing new in it except an authorization to the respective Secretaries to make regulations for carrying into execution any sentence of confinement in any correctional or penal institution under the control of the United States. This was drafted after consultation with the correctional branches to the services and its purpose is to make available more adequate facilities for rehabilitation of offenders.

Part IX, articles 59 to 76, provides for the appellate review of court-martial cases. It makes a number of innovations in which I am sure you will be interested. The present procedures of the Army and Navy differ widely. The chart in the center shows the Army procedure. The one in the rear shows the Navy procedure of appeal review, and the chart on the right shows the procedure provided for in the Uniform Code for all the services. It will be seen that the proposed procedure is very much simpler than the more complex ones now followed by the Army and by the Navy.

The Army system particularly is exceedingly complex. To the review by the convening authority and the Board of Review, further review was added in 1948 by Congress by a judicial counsel, composed of three general officers. The course of review for several types of cases is painstakingly spelled out in the Articles of War by reference to and in conjunction with the respective functions of approving and confirming authorities, and is difficult for the nonexpert to diagram or understand. The Navy system of review, on the other hand, is far more informal and, in the main, rests ultimately with the Secretary of the Navy. It provides a review by the convening authority, a review in the office of the Judge Advocate General and an additional review on sentence by the Bureau of Personnel and by a Sentence Review Board. The action of all these agencies, however, is advisory only. The Morgan committee felt obliged to devise a system that would be useful and practical for all services, and would be consonant with the plan of unification.

In essence, the appellate review proposed in the Uniform Code is as follows: There is an initial review by the convening authority covering law, facts, credibility of witnesses, and a review of the sentence. In this respect, it is in all essentials the same as the first review provided at the present time by both the Army and the Navy. Insofar as the convening authority has affirmed a finding or sentence against the accused, a review is provided by a Board of Review in the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Department of which accused is a member. This Board of Review is a counterpart cf the present Board of Review of the Army. As the amendment of 1948 provides, it reviews the record of the trial for law, facts, and sentence. To this extent, the Navy system is changed. Following this review, there is a review for errors of law by a single Court of Military Appeals composed of three civilians. It is apparent that such a tribunal is necessary to insure uniformity of interpretation and administration throughout the armed services. Moreover, it is consistent with the principle of civilian control of the armed forces that a court of final appeal on the law should be composed of civilians.

The result of this pattern for an appellate system will be that the appellate procedure will be strengthened by a greater centralization of authority in tribunals, rather than in individuals as at present. This appellate system also has the virtue of being less complex than the present systems and should result in greater protection for an accused. In general, it is patterned after the appellate system of the Federal courts, with the Court of Military Appeals closely following the procedures of the Supreme Court of the United States.

While some differences of opinion were expressed by the witnesses on the merits of the Court of Military Appeals, the preponderance of opinion was favorable. Several individuals and some of the reserve associations criticized the court as too civilian in nature and as accomplishing an unnecessary amount of unification. There was also a difference of opinion between the services themselves, with the Department of the Army registering a dissent to this type of court. On the other hand, the Navy, the Air Force, Professor Morgan, the bar associations, the AMVETS, the American Veterans Committee and a number of other witnesses strongly favor such a supreme civilian court of military law. The position of the proponents of this court is that it is necessary if the substantive and procedural law of the Uniform Code—which applies to all persons in the services—is to be uniformly interpreted. In addition, they see a need for a final authority on the law and feel that the present system—whereby the Secretaries of the Departments or the President are called upon to decide questions of law—is completely inadequate. In addition, they believe that a court of this character, with the prestige of a United States

Court of Appeals, will do a great deal to insure public confidence in the fairness of military justice. The House committee and our committee feel that a court of this character will result in major improvements in the trial of courts martial.

As originally drafted, the judges of this court were to be appointed by the President, after confirmation by the Senate for life. Our committee carefully considered this provision and felt that, since the court represents a new concept in military law, it was advisable to provide the appointment of the judges for a term of years, rather than for life. Accordingly, our committee amended the provisions relating to tenure and has made them similar to the Tax Court of the United States and some of the Territorial courts.

Part IX also provides in article 70 for appellate counsel to assure that the parties will be adequately represented before the boards of review and the Court of Military Appeals. These counsel are to be appointed by the Judge Advocate Generals with provision for the accused to have his own counsel. Article 72 provides for a hearing before the suspension of a serious sentence can be vacated. Both of these articles are new.

Part X covers punitive articles. In the main, the present punitive articles of the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy are retained. There are, however, several interesting features of the proposed punitive articles. In the first place, there are set forth some general provisions normally found in modern penal laws and not heretofore contained in the Articles of War or the Articles for the Government of the Navy. These cover the definitions of a "principal," "an accessory after the fact," "attempts to commit crimes," "conspiracies," and "solicitations." You will notice as you study them that the punitive articles consolidate a number of offenses, in the same fashion as many other provisions are consolidated in the code. An example of this is the crime of desertion, which is now contained in article 85. The same material was heretofore found in Articles of War 28 and 58 and in Articles for the Government of the Navy 10, 4—paragraph 6—and 8—paragraph 21.

In addition, several offenses which were previously punishable under the general article are specifically set forth. One of them is designated as "missing movement," which is contained in article 87. This is an aggravated type of absence without leave and is designed to meet conditions encountered in World War II. The experience of World War II indicates that a large number of military personnel who were legitimately on leave or who left without permission returned after their unit or ship had moved or sailed. This misconduct caused so much trouble that it was felt necessary to make it a subject of a specific article. Article 105, entitled "Misconduct as Prisoner," is also new and provides for punishment of anyone subject to the code, who while in the hands of the enemy in time of war either for the purpose of securing favorable treatment for himself or while in a position of authority, mistreats others who are confined with him. You will recall that a number of instances of this type came to light after the war. They justify the enactment of this specific offense.

The last part, namely part XI, contains a number of miscellaneous articles such as those regulating the procedures before courts of inquiry, those providing for authority to administer oaths, and for complaints against superiors, and for redress for damage done to private property by members of the armed forces.

As I have already indicated, the remaining sections of the bill relate to military justice but are not appropriately part of the Uniform Code. I would like to comment particularly on two of them, the first is section 12, which provides for a petition to the Judge Advocate General for review of court-martial cases involving offenses committed during World War II. The Kem amendment of 1948 contained a similar provision but it was applicable to the Army and Air Force only. This section extends the right to such review to members of all the services.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator whether his committee has made a study of the business which would come before the Court of Military Appeals which is established by the bill, as provided at page 161.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes, the committee has considered that problem and has made some study of it.

Mr. KEM. In the course of a normal year in time of peace, how many cases would the court have to consider?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Cases will go to the Court of Military Appeals if the accused petitions to have the court consider his case or if cases are sent to the court by the Judge Advocate General.

When cases go to the Court of Military Appeals, they will do so only on questions of law, in other words, the situation will be analogous to that under the principle of a petition of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The greatest number of the cases of course would be settled and disposed of before they ever reached the Court of Military Appeals; cases would go to that court only on matters of law or of military jurisdiction.

Mr. KEM. I understand that.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Considering the number of courts martial, the witnesses who testified before our committee, the Morgan committee, and the House committee, including those representing the three armed services, as I understand, were of the opinion that this court would be sufficient to handle the cases which would come before it.

Mr. KEM. I had no doubt that it would be sufficient; but my question was predicated on whether the court would have enough to do to keep its members busy, whether the bill would give the court jurisdiction sufficiently broad to keep three men busy throughout the year, in time of peace.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say that was one of the questions which arose and which caused the Senate committee to recommend that the terms of the three judges be not for life, but for a certain number of years, the idea being that after a certain amount of experience we would know fairly well whether there should be additional judges or fewer judges.

But the general feeling was that there would be sufficient work, or perhaps a little more than sufficient, for them to do, to keep them very busy; that probably 2,000 or 3,000 cases a year would come to them.

Mr. KEM. Of course, there is no way to estimate the number of writs of certiorari which would be granted.

Mr. KEFAUVER. There is no way to determine that now. It would be the privilege of an accused to apply for one. I suppose that if the court wished to take on more work, it could grant more writs of certiorari.

But we have no present way of determining how much work the court will have to do; I suppose the only way we can tell will be by experience.

Mr. President, one very worth-while section of the proposed code is that which requires the Court of Military Appeals to make to the Congress an annual report in which it will state the number of cases it has tried, the disposition of the cases, and its recommendations for improvement of the system. At the present time Congress does not receive annual recommendations or reports about military justice.

A second part of the bill relating to military justice, on which I should like to comment at this point, is section 13, which is related to the issue of whether or not officers in the legal branch of an armed force should be on a separate promotion list, or, to put it another way, whether a Judge Advocate General's corps should be created in each of the services. Such a corps was created in the Army by the Kem amendment. The bill before us maintains the status quo, which means that there will continue to be no such corps in the Navy or Air Force.

Members of the House who have been strong supporters of the corps idea have agreed that its operation in the Army should be tested further before creating a corps for each of the other services. At the same time, they feel that the bill should contain more specific requirements with respect to the legal qualifications of the Judge Advocate General. These requirements are incorporated in section 13 of the bill.

Our committee agrees that the operation of the corps in the Army should be evaluated over some further period, to determine whether or not it serves its purpose. I believe the corps has now been in operation since February 1, 1949.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point for a question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. Do I correctly understand that the bill provides for a separate Judge Advocate General's corps for the Army, but not for the Air Force or for the Navy? Am I correct in my understanding as to that?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The bill leaves the corps for the Army as is provided by the Senator's amendment of 1948.

Mr. KEM. The bill does not provide a similar corps for the Air Force or the Navy, does it?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It does not.

Mr. KEM. What is the justification for having a separate Judge Advocate General corps for the Army, but not for the other branches of the Military Establishment?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It was established separately at the time of enactment of the Senator's amendment. The amendment did not apply to the Navy or to the Air Force. The Navy has never wished to have a separate corps, and my information is that the Air Corps does not wish to have a separate corps. I think there is something about their operation which would make a separate corps less suitable for them than it is for the Army; at least, that is the way the other two services feel about the matter.

Mr. KEM. I may say to the Senator that it was intended that the amendment apply both to the Army and to the Air Force. I think the discussion on the floor at the time will show that the Members of the Senate, at least, understood that was the purpose and intention regarding the legislation then proposed.

But my question of the Senator is this: If a separate Judge Advocate General's corps is sound as an institution for the Army, why is not equally sound for the Air Force and for the Navy? On the other hand, if it is not sound for them, why should we go to the trouble and expense of establishing one in the Army?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is what we wish to find out; we wish to ascertain how it will work and whether it will meet all the expectations of the Senator or of some of those in the Army. It has been in effect in the Army only 1 year from yesterday, I believe. After a trial of it and after the passage of this unification bill, after we see how it works, if it works very satisfactorily, perhaps the Air Corps and the Navy will later wish to have a similar corps for themselves, and the Congress will give it to them.

Mr. KEM. I am surprised to hear the Senator say that, because I thought the justification for the unification bill was that there would be actual unification of the armed forces, and I thought that this bill is being presented to us as a unified code of military justice.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Actually, I think the matter of a separate corps should be handled as an amendment to the National Defense Act. That matter does not have much to do with military justice. I believe that the bill creating a separate corps for the Army was an amendment to the National Defense Act.

Mr. KEM. It was an amendment to the Selective Service law.

Mr. KEFAUVER. But the amendment stated that the National Defense Act should be amended so as to make that provision.

Mr. KEM. There is no reason why it could not be done in this bill, however.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; it could be done in that way. But, properly, it should come up when the National Defense Act is being considered for amendment, because it would amend that act, although it was offered to the selective service law.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Am I correct, I ask the Senator from Tennessee, when I say to the Senator from Missouri, that, particularly in the case of the Navy, the reasons the committee had for not extending this corps to the Navy were very practical ones, namely, that the Navy pointed out that a separate legal force would upset their whole arrangements and procedure with respect to officers, not only on shipboard, where, of course, general courts martial do not often occur, but also in their various land installations, which are generally very far apart. In such case the legal officer would have little work of this sort to do; and in order to utilize his services sufficiently he would have to be assigned other work, and so would any assistants he might have. In fact, if there were to be a legal officer for this purpose at such points, there would not be sufficient work for him and for his assistants to do to justify the establishment of a separate force.

In my opinion that is the reason why a separate corps should not be established in the Navy, although it is established in the Army. I believe we should wait to see how it will work in the Army. I ask the Senator whether that was the testimony?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; that was the testimony—in short, to wait to see how it will work.

I may also say to the Senator from Missouri that Public Law 759, the Kem amendment, at page 64, section 247, creates a separate corps. Section 8 of the National Defense Act, as amended, was amended in that way, and the corps was created. So actually this matter should come up in the consideration of an amendment to the National Defense Act; and I am sure that, after experience with this provision of the pending bill, it will.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator whether the reasoning of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the Navy would apply to the Air Force?

Mr. KEFAUVER. That was the position of the Air Force. They have fewer members, who are here and there, and not stationed so permanently as are Army forces. So they thought the conditions applicable to the Navy would apply to the Air Force. As I said before, our committee agreed that the operation of the corps in the Army should be evaluated over a further period to determine whether or not it serves its purpose. That purpose is to assure to legal officers and judge advocates an independence which will encourage a fair and objective exercise of their judicial functions. Whether, as a practical matter, an independent promotion list does this, or is the way to do it, is very much open to question. Much more important may be the provisions I have already mentioned which allow judge advocates in the chain of command to communicate directly with one another and which put the control of the assignment of staff judge advocates and legal officers in the hands of the Judge Advocate General. For these reasons our committee feels that consideration of the corps question—a question which is one of internal organization and relates to the National Defense Act rather than to the Uniform Code of Military Justice—should be postponed. Such a postponement will give Congress the benefit of the views of the judges of the Court of Military Appeals in the annual report prescribed in article 67.

As I have said before, we feel that a conscientious effort has been made by a large group of people who have worked a long time on this whole subject, and, though necessarily not perfect, the code has a large number of advantages to recommend it. It makes uniform the application of one law, substantive and procedural, to all persons serving in the armed services, and this, in itself, is a tremendous improvement over the present diverse systems in operation. In addition, it provides a large number of added protections, and meets, to a large extent, the criticisms that have been leveled against military justice over the years. It is a code that is drafted in modern legislative language, arranged in an orderly sequence, and should be far more understandable to laymen and to civilian lawyers, as well as to men learned in military law than the present statutes in this field.

On behalf of the Senate Committee on Armed Services, I strongly urge favorable action by the Senate on this bill.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield for a furthur question?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KEM. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to page 202 of the bill, and particularly to the section headed "Commanders' duties of example and correction," which reads, in part, as follows:

> All commanding officers and others in authority in the naval service are required to show in themselves a good example of virtue, honor, patriotism, and subordination; to be vigilant in inspecting the conduct of all persons who are placed under their command; to guard against and suppress all dissolute and immoral practices, and to correct, according to the laws and regulations of the Navy, all persons who are guilty of them.

Why is not that provision made applicable to the other branches of the armed services?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the distinguished Senator that this provision, or substantially this, has been in the Articles of War and in the Articles for the Government of the Navy for a long time.

Mr. KEM. We are here dealing with unification, are we not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Navy wanted to keep it. The Navy did not want it in the code, and the Army and the Air Force did not want it in the code, so it was put in as a general statutory provision.

Mr. KEM. Are we to take it that, generally speaking, those duties are to be placed on the Navy, because the commanding officers and others in authority in the other branches of the armed services are not so well qualified "to show in themselves a good example of virtue, honor, patriotism, and subordination," and so they are not required "to be vigilant in inspecting the conduct of all persons who are placed under their command"?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The Army and the Air Force did not feel they needed statutory provisions requiring them to do their duty, but the Navy had an additional and supplemental interest in the provision, and it is very anxious to keep it. It is separate and distinct from the code, and we thought it would do no harm. The Navy wanted it, and we put it in the back of the bill. It is not in the code. It is the code we try to make uniform.

Mr. KEM. Does it have any purpose in a unification law, a law that purports to apply uniformly throughout the armed services?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I may say to the distinguished Senator, it is not in the code. The code ends on page 200. This is a separate statutory provision in the back of the bill. The Navy has a sentimental interest in the provision that the others do not share. That is the situation.

Mr. KEM. It is a part of the same bill, is it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; but it is the code that we are trying to make uniform.

Mr. KEM. Is it a part of the same bill?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; it is part of the same bill, but it is not in the Uniform Code.

Mr. KEM. Where does the Senator find in the bill anything indicating that the code ends before this provision is reached?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The articles of the code continue to the middle of page 200.

Mr. KEM. Where is the provision that indicates that to be so?

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the Senator will turn to page 104, beginning in line 13, he will note the following:

That a Uniform Code of Military Justice for the government of the armed forces of the United States, unifying, consolidating, revising, and codifying the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, is hereby enacted as follows, and the articles in this section may be cited as "Uniform Code of Military Justice, article —."

That is section 1. What the Senator was reading is section 7 (c) of the bill, but that is not the code.

Mr. KEM. I did not understand the Senator's reference to the language which indicates the exclusion from the code of the part to which I referred. If the Senator will direct my attention to that language, I shall appreciate it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The particular language is that, beginning on page 104, in lines 17 and 18, "and the articles in this section may be cited as 'Uniform Code of Military Justice, article * * *'." It is section 1, and is followed by part 1, general provisions.

Mr. KEM. The articles in this section?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes. Then section 2 begins on page 200; so from 104 to the middle of page 200——

Mr. KEM. Where does section 1 begin?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Section 1 begins on page 104, line 13, of the bill, as proposed by the committee to be amended. The Senator will note that the House text is all stricken out down to line 13, page 104.

Mr. KEM. The bill is entitled "An act to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice." It does not say anything there about requirements of attendance on church or of proper subordination in the Navy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. KEM. If the Senator will permit me to complete my question, I shall appreciate it very much.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. KEM. It seems to me, if the Senator's position is that the bill covers more than a uniform code, the title should be amended. It is misleading.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The code is contained in section 1, following which certain statutory provisions are proposed to be enacted.

Mr. KEM. Should not the title be amended to show the inclusion of certain salutary admonitions to the Navy?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The title is rather broad, I think.

Mr. KEM. The title is, "An act to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice." Certainly no person reading it would get the idea that additional enactments with reference to the Navy were to be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Who has the floor?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, my answer to the Senator from Missouri would be that this bill is written as every other bill is written. In almost every bill the first section immediately follows the title, and it is called section 1. In this bill section 1 begins on line 13, page 104, and provides:

That a Uniform Code of Military Justice for the government of the armed forces of the United States, unifying, consolidating, revising, and codifying the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, is hereby enacted as follows—

And so forth. Then we come to section 2, on page 200. Section 2 is a sort of catch-all. For instance, it is not necessary in the case of the Army, to take care of things that happen on the high seas. In the Navy the captain of a ship has always been supreme. He must be supreme. Therefore his conduct must be good. It seems to me that is a situation which applies particularly to the Navy. So the provision referred to by the Senator from Missouri is not a part of the code, for the technical reason that it is in section 2, and is not in section 1.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, the question I want to ask the Senator from Tennessee is this: If we are going to lay down requirements as to virtue, honor, patriotism, subordination, dissolute and immoral practices, and so forth, why have we singled out the Navy?

Mr. KEFAUVER. One reason is that they have asked for it, and the other services have not. There are some things applying to the Navy which are a little different from things which apply to the Army and the Air Corps, and they are not a part of the code. This bill is an effort to get all these matters together in the same bill.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is correct to say for the record that there is nothing in this bill which is applicable to the National Guard of the several States?

Mr. KEFAUVER. There is not, unless members of the National Guard are on Federal service.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does the Senator mean by his answer to state that the National Guard and no components of personnel thereof would be affected by or subject to any of the provisions of this bill until and unless they have been actually federalized?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Until they have been actually called or ordered to duty or training by the Federal Government.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That provision is found on page 107 of the bill. I thank the Senator from Florida for asking the questions.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I advised the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] earlier in the day that I would, at an early time, during the consideration of House bill 4080, move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The hour is too late, it seems to me, to present that motion at this time. I should not care to suggest the absence of a quorum now. Hence, I shall defer making the motion until the Senate reconvenes tomorrow. I shall, however, after the Senate reconvenes tomorrow, and at the earliest opportunity, move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration by that committee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the Senator's motion is not to be made tonight, I wonder if the exchange of correspondence between the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, can be inserted in the RECORD at this time. It might be of some enlightenment to the Members of the Senate. Will the Senator from Nevada place that correspondence in the RECORD, or would he object if I should do so?

Mr. MCCARRAN. I have here a copy of my letter, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, addressed to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] on July 1, 1949. I do not have at hand the reply of the Senator from Maryland, but that can be furnished. I have also a copy of my letter of July 19, addressed to the Senator from Maryland on the same subject. If the Senator from Tennessee has the letter in reply to that, the correspondence can go into the RECORD so that it may become a part of the RECORD at this time in connection with my motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, if that is satisfactory to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; it is satisfactory to me. There will be included in the RECORD first, the Senator's original letter of July 1, the response to that letter dated July 13, and the reply of the Senator from Nevada dated July 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to including in the RECORD the correspondence referred to?

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
July 1, 1949.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: H. R. 4080, the so-called code of military justice, was reported to the Senate from the Committee on Armed Services on June 10, 1949.

In many of its provisions this bill deals with matters which I believe to be properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary; therefore, I believe it to be my duty to attempt to enforce what I consider to be the jurisdiction of the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman. Therefore, I intend to move that the bill, H. R. 4080, be taken from the Senate Calendar and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I hope you may feel it will not be necessary to oppose my motion, for I should like to have your cooperation in this matter.

I do not wish to burden you now with a detailed discussion of this question, but let me cite some of the more compelling instances of provisions in the bill which I feel should have the scrutiny of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Article 2 of the proposed new code of military justice makes it clear that those to whom the code applies (in addition to regular and volunteer personnel) include:

"(1) * * * all inductees from the time of their actual induction into the armed forces of the United States, and all other persons lawfully called or ordered into, or to duty in or for training in, the armed forces, from the dates they are required by the terms of the call or order to obey the same; * * * (2) Reserve personnel while they are on inactive duty training authorized by written orders which are voluntarily accepted by them, which orders specify that they are subject to this code; * * * (10) in time of war, all persons serving with or accompanying an armed force in the field; (11) subject to the provisions of any treaty or agreement to which the United States is or may be a party or to any accepted rule of international law, all persons serving with, employed by, or accompanying the armed forces without the continental limits of the United States and the following Territories: That part of Alaska * * *, the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands."

The above provisions greatly broaden the scope of authority and jurisdiction of military courts. In fact, those civilians who would thus be brought within the jurisdiction of military justice appear to include Mr. McCloy and all personnel of the Allied military government, as well as, no one knows how many, persons in Hawaii, since article 5 provides that this code shall be applicable in all places.

Article 3 of the proposed code lays the jurisdiction to try former personnel for offenses committted while subject to the code, if they cannot be tried in the United States courts and if the sentence could be 5 years or more.

This provision, like the provision above referred to, is extremely important when it is realized the code does not provide for bond, arraignment, or any of the usual rights accorded to even the worst type of civilian defendant.

Article 76 of the proposed code seeks to make the administrative action taken final and binding upon all departments, courts, agencies, and officers of the United States.

This seems to me an extremely dangerous provision and subject to serious question on constitutional grounds. It is questionable whether an act of Congress could thus rob the Supreme Court of appellate jurisdiction. I do not believe all civilian courts should be closed to anyone with respect to all matters which may have been tried before a military tribunal or administratively determined by the military. I question the wisdom of conferring absolute finality upon the decisions of an alleged court, the members of which are subject to removal by an administrative officer.

I believe the above is sufficient to show the reasons for my conviction that this bill should have the most serious consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary before being enacted into law.

Kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman.

JULY 13, 1949.

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: This will acknowledge your letter of July 1, 1949, in connection with H. R. 4080, the so-called code of military justice bill, and informing me of your intention to move that this bill be taken from the Senate Calendar and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

You will recall our earlier conversations on this subject and your agreement that jurisdiction properly lay in the Committee on Armed Services. In view of this, I am surprised that you now feel the bill should be referred to your committee. Your letter of April 10, 1949, to me setting forth your recommendations with respect to H. R. 4080 created the impression in my mind that you desired the Committee on Armed Services, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, to consider your suggestions. As you know, a number of your recommendations now appear in the bill as amended by this committee. In addition, I am sure you are aware of the extent of the hearings in the House of Representatives and before this committee on this bill and the full consideration given to it. I hope that you will reconsider your intention of moving that the bill be taken from the Senate Calendar, and would like to briefly outline for you some of the considerations this committee had before it when it considered the articles you cite in your letter.

You mention that you feel that parts of the code deal with matters within the jurisdiction of your committee and you state, specifically, that you feel article 2 is such a provision. Your comment on article 2 is that it greatly broadens the scope of authority and jurisdiction in military courts. I think you will find that a close scrutiny of the present statutory provisions covering jurisdiction as found in the Articles of War and the Articles for the Government of the Navy disclose that article 2 is, to a large extent, a reincorporation of the present laws and there are no subdivisions of it which can be said to create new jurisdiction or broaden the present authority of either the Army or the Navy, or a combination of both of them. For instance, article 2, subdivision (1) is drawn from present Article of War 2, 10 United States Code, section 1473 (a) and section 12 of the Selective Service Act of 1948.

Article 2, subdivision (2), which reads, "Reserve personnel while they are on active duty training authorized by written orders," etc., is actually a restricted version of the authority heretofore provided for the Navy in 34 United States Code, section 855. Very close attention was given to this article. I am sure you are familiar with the extensive discussion in the House hearings and our hearings on that single subdivision. For your convenience, I here quote the present Navy jurisdiction and you will note that, by comparison with it, subdivision (2) greatly restricts the jurisdiction.

"S. 855. Naval Reserve, application of laws, regulations, and orders of Navy; disciplinary actions:

"All members of the Naval Reserve, when employed on active duty, authorized training duty, with or without pay, drill, or other equivalent instruction or duty, or when employed in authorized travel to or from such duty, or appropriate duty, drill, or instruction, or during such time as they may by law be required to perform active duty, or while wearing a uniform prescribed for the Naval Reserve, shall be subject to the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of the Navy: Provided, That disciplinary action for an offense committed while subject to the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of the Navy shall not be barred by reason of release from duty status of any person charged with the commission thereof: Provided further, That for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this section into effect, members of the Naval Reserve may be retained on or returned to a duty status without their consent, but not for a longer period of time than may be required for disciplinary action. (June 25, 1938, ch. 690, title III, p. 301, 52 Stat. 1180.)"

Subdivisions (10) and (11) are reincorporations of provisions found in the Articles of War and the Navy Statutes (see Article of War 2 (d), 10 U. S. C. sec. 1473, and see 34 U. S. C. sec. 1201). In this connection, further, I would like to point out that our committee considered the suggestions you made in your letter of April 30, 1949. I note that in your letter you suggested amendments to subdivisions (10) and (11) and I think that, as approved by our committee, they reflect your ideas. Furthermore, I think a close reading of subdivision (11) would result in the opposite construction of the language to the one apparently placed in your letter; to wit: jurisdiction is specifically not provided in the Canal Zone, the main group of the Hawaiian Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. In passing, I am positive that these subdivisions would not bring within the jurisdiction of courts martial a person in the position of high commissioner. The reason I take this position is that the language of article 2 is practically identical to Article of War 2, which has always been construed by the Federal courts and the military as follows. I quote from Court Martial Manual 329933, 7 bulletin, Judge Advocate General 125 (June 17, 1948):

"Under the provision of AW 2 (d), persons 'accompanying or serving with' the armies of the United States without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States are subject to the Articles of War. The word 'accompanying' first appeared in the code of 1916 (see General Crowder's remarks in Senate Report No. 130, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 37), but the jurisdictional phrase 'serving with' may be found in all the American military codes from the earliest times (1775 articles, art. XXXII; 1776 articles, sec. XIII, art. 23; 1806 articles, art. 60; 1874 articles, art 63) * * * In those cases, however, where a civilian has been held to have been 'accompanying' the armies, it appeared that he has either moved with a military operation or that his presence within a military installation or theater was not merely incidental but was connected with or dependent upon the activities of the armies or their personnel. He must, in order to come within this class of persons subject to military law, 'accompany' the military service in fact * * * Conversely, one may be 'serving with' the armies without accompanying them, as in the case of an employee of a military installation 'in the field in time of war' or 'without the territorial jurisdiction,' which is located near the employee's civilian residence and at which he performs his daily work, living as he would were he employed at some nonmilitary task in the locality (see SPJGW 1945/4990, 23 June and 2 July 1945, 4 Bull. JAG 223, and cases cited therein)."

Article 3 of the code provides, in general, for a continuing jurisdiction under certain circumstances where jurisdiction has previously attached and was segregated from article 2 for that reason, even though as you pointed out, it generally covers the question of jurisdiction. The problem encountered in connection with this article, and particularly subdivision (a) of it, concerns those types of situations where persons have committed offenses while serving on active duty in the armed services and who, thereafter, by virtue of some artificial situation, are unable to be tried either by courts martial or the Federal courts. In general, the classes of cases fall into three categories: (1) Reservists who go on inactive duty; (2) persons who are discharged from the service; and (3) persons who, although once discharged, reenter the service. A number of cases falling into these categories have taken place, and it has been found that no jurisdiction resides in any court to bring them to trial. Several cases of this kind received a considerable amount of publicity and you will undoubtedly remember them. For instance, a case falling in the category of reenlistment is the Hirshberg case in the Navy. You will recall that Hirshberg was captured by the Japanese and, after being rescued and returned to this country, was discharged from the Navy and on the same day reenlisted for a new term. There later came to light facts which warranted the charge that he had mistreated fellow-American prisoners while he was a Japanese captive for purposes of enhancing his own fortunes. The alleged acts, of course, occurred overseas, outside the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The question of whether or not the Navy had jurisdiction to try him for these charges, where the discharge intervened—even though he was out of the service for 1 day only—was settled by the Supreme Court, which held that the Navy had lost jurisdiction by virtue of the discharge. Under these circumstances, no court—military or civilian—had jurisdiction to determine whether or not Hirshberg had committed a serious offense. I think it is noteworthy to point out that the Supreme Court's decision was based entirely on a lack of statutory authority and specifically did not involve a constitutional question.

Another case falling within one of these classifications was the Durant case, in which it was charged that Mrs. Durant, at one time a captain in the WAC, was implicated in the theft of the crown jewels of Hesse. Since the theft was committed in Europe, the civilian courts had no jurisdiction and the question of jurisdiction of the military courts was raised because the facts were not discovered, nor was the trial instituted, until Mrs. Durant was on terminal leave. You will recall, in this case, that it was held that the Army courts martial had jurisdiction, but it is clear that, if the referral for trial had been delayed for another 2 or 3 weeks, when her terminal leave would have expired, Mrs. Durant could not have been tried at all for a very serious crime of which she was ultimately convicted. Providing jurisdiction in this type of case, as this subdivision attempts to do, finds some precedent in the existing Articles of War and Articles for the Government of the Navy, which, of course, give a continuing jurisdiction over certain types of offenses committed while on active duty involving frauds against the Government. (See article of war 94, 10 U. S. C., sec. 1566, and article 14 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy, 34 U. S. C., sec. 1200.)

Insofar as reservists in inactive duty are concerned, I assume you have already noted from Thirty-fourth United States Code, section 855, that the Navy has jurisdiction over reservists who have previously committed offenses while on active duty.

It was for the purpose of covering cases of this type, over which there is no present jurisdiction, that article 3 (a) was drafted. It seems entirely fair that, within the statute of limitations, persons who have committed offenses should not gain an immunity or be excused by virtue of the administrative act of going off active duty or being separated from the armed forces. However, it was not intended to extend blanket jurisdiction over cases of this type, or to convey to military courts jurisdiction under these circumstances over every trivial offense. For that reason, the jurisdiction is limited to serious crimes only by virtue of the provision that the offense must call for a sentence of at least 5 years. In addition, it was felt that where the Federal or State courts have jurisdiction, such jurisdiction should not be disturbed, and there would be no justification in also giving it to the courts martial. For that reason, it is provided that the courts martial are to have jurisdiction only if the civil courts do not have it.

I note that in your letter of April 30, 1949, you make the comment that the enactment of article 3, as then written, would foreclose appeals to the civil courts in cases such as the Durant case. That case was not an appeal in the narrow sense of the word, but was a petition for habeas corpus, which, as you know, was denied. Article 3 in no way interferes with the right to seek habeas corpus. You make the same comment with respect to article 76 in your letter of July 1, 1949. This article is drawn almost word for word from article of war 50 (h), 10 United States Code, section 1522, and is a statement of the law as interpreted by the Federal courts. See Humphrey v. Smith (93 L. ed. 774 (Supreme Court 1949)); Schita v. Cox (139 F. 2d 971 (C. C. A. 8th 1944), certiorari denied, 322 U. S. 761); Henry v. Hodges (76 F. Supp. 698 (S. D. N. Y. 1948)). The reports of both the Senate and House Armed Services Committees specifically state that article 76 does not foreclose the right to habeas corpus in the Federal courts.

Based on the above analysis of the points you bring up, I think you can be satisfied that careful considerations of those items were given by the House and Senate committees. In addition, I think the explanation demonstrates that they contain no new material which would bring them within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

In my opinion, the whole subject of military justice is one which falls wholly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services. This opinion is based on my interpretation of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on the Judiciary as set forth in the Legislative Reorganization Act, and based on a long-standing precedent. You will find that in the last 50 years all matters on this subject have been considered as falling within the jurisdiction of the Committees on Armed Services or their predecessor committees. In the Eightieth Congress, the Committee on Armed Services had jurisdiction over the bills which ultimately became Public Law 759 and also over proposed amendments to the Articles for the Government of the Navy. Legislation on military justice has been before the Military Affairs Committees in 1912, 1913, 1916, 1919, 1937 and 1942.

In view of all these considerations, I hope you will not go forward with your intention of moving that the bill be taken from the Calendar. It is an extremely important step toward unification and provides for reforms in the court-martial system which should be enacted as soon as possible. I have received a letter from the Secretary of Defense in which he strongly urges its passage in the present session of Congress. My present feeling is that it should go forward at this time, and for that reason I would not like to be required to oppose your motion.

I would appreciate it if you would let me know your decision in this matter and would welcome your support of the bill.

Sincerely,

MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman.

JULY 19, 1949.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: I have your letter of July 13, with regard to the motion which I have advised you I intend to offer, to refer the bill H. R. 4080 to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I do, indeed, recall our earlier conversations on this subject. They began with discussion of resolutions pending before the Committee on the Judiciary for the investigation of military justice. You pointed out that similar resolutions were pending before the Committee on Armed Services, and that the committee was also working on a new code of military justice; and, as I recall it, you suggested that I allow the matter to rest with the Committee on Armed Services until you had concluded your deliberations on this bill, with the thought that then we could discuss the matter further.

In conformance with this agreement, the Judiciary Committee has taken no action on the resolutions pending before it for the investigation of military justice, and the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services to consider and deal with the bill H. R. 4080 has not been challenged. I am not challenging that jurisdiction now, and I have no intention of challenging it. All I am doing is asserting that the bill includes subject matter clearly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary, and asking that now, after the Committee on Armed Services has had its say, the bill may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration of those matters which do lie within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

While it is true that, in a spirit of cooperation, I submitted to you, as chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, a very lengthy letter expressing some of my personal views with regard to the bill H. R. 4080, it must be clear that this did not amount to action or consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, and I cannot feel that the opportunity given me personally to express my views, and the consideration given by the Committee on Armed Services to the views so expressed, should operate to divest the Committee on the Judiciary of its jurisdiction.

Because I know there is not and will not be any acrimony between us with respect to this matter, I do not wish to attempt a point-by-point traverse of your letter. However, in fairness, I believe I should make one or two comments.

Article 2, subdivision (3) may be a "restricted version of the authority heretofore provided for the Navy" but it cannot be denied that it expands jurisdiction to members of the Army and Air Force Reserve. Furthermore, one must bear in mind that, under article 3, such personnel may be recalled to duty without their consent for trial of offenses committed while on such duty with a questionable statute of limitations applicable and limited only (as to military offenses) by the 5-year sentence proviso. This latter limitation is in turn limited only by article 56 which grants the President authority (which he may delegate under art. 140) to prescribe limits.

In arriving at your conclusions with respect to subdivisions (10) and (11) of article 3, you have evidently not considered the decision rendered in McCune v. Kilpatrick (53 Fed. Supp. 80), where a civilian cook, hired to provide meals for a merchant-marine crew and armed guard, was held amenable to trial by court martial on charges of desertion, when he quit his job after learning that he was also supposed to cook for about 500 Army troops being transported overseas.

As to the Hirshberg and Durant cases, it can just as reasonably be argued that Congress should confer jurisdiction on civilian courts to try such cases as that we should further expand the authority of military tribunals.

The fact that extant laws provide or do not provide remedies for certain offenses is not the basic question here. It is rather the limit to which we have permitted or will expand the jurisdiction of military courts over the lives and fortunes of our ordinary citizens and nationals. There can be no denial of the power of Congress to confer jurisdiction on our inferior courts to consider all matters relating to military offenses. The pattern to be followed by military courts in times of emergency was set in Hawaii following December 7, 1941.

I do not doubt that careful consideration was given to every word of the bill by both the Senate and House committees, but I submit that the viewpoint from which the consideration is given is most important. Although the committee reports state that it was not the intention to foreclose petitions for writs of habeas corpus, I believe you will agree that the proposed language of the bill is clear and unambiguous and would, therefore, never be required to be interpreted by reference to the committee report. Under this language, even if it should be held that the writ might lie—which is doubtful—the action of a military court would not be subject to challenge, and therefore the writ could provide no real relief.

I cannot agree that "the whole subject of military justice is one which falls wholly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services." The Legislative Reorganization Act specifically commits to the Committee on the Judiciary jurisdiction over "judicial proceedings, civil and criminal, generally," and over "civil liberties." Where the rights and liberties of civilians are concerned, I believe the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary should stand unquestioned; and there is no doubt such rights are involved in the bill H. R. 4080.

I certainly do not wish to enter into a controversy with you over this matter; and I assure you that if the bill is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary it will be considered most promptly, and most promptly reported back to the Senate.

Kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman.

DISPLACED PERSONS ACT OF 1948—AMENDMENTS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I reported to the Senate on January 25, 1950, with amendments, House bill 4567, to amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948.

Notwithstanding the numerous issues and vast amount of factual material which necessitated extensive consideration and deliberation, I was determined that: First, there should be compliance by the committee with the resolution of the Senate, and second, there should be inserted in the bill amendments to strengthen the administration of the act. I am gratified that both of these objectives have been accomplished.

But, Mr. President, there remain for the consideration and decision of the Senate issues of great consequence to the welfare of this Nation, which I shall discuss in detail at a later date. Some of these issues are as follows:

First. Are we to embark on a course which will result in opening the floodgates of this Nation for the entry of untold millions of aliens from the turbulent populations of the entire world who are storming our portals for admission? Right there, may I again emphasize the fact that aside from the relatively few eligible war-displaced persons, all of whom will, by the expiration date of our present displaced-persons law, be resettled or repatriated, the number of persons in the world who are de facto displaced and who are potentially eligible under the constitution of the International Refugee Organization runs into the twenty millions, and the ranks of these persons are being swelled at an alarming rate.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the strong humanitarian implications, we cannot solve the problems of the world by mass immigration to the United States. To attempt to do so will be to transplant these problems here and superimpose them on our own gigantic social and economic problems.

Second. In determining the extent to which additional numbers of displaced persons should be admitted into the United States, should we consider the tremendous increase in the influx into the United States, both legally and illegally, of aliens from all over the world who are arriving on our shores in such numbers that our immigration officers are swamped with an overwhelming work load?

Third. What consideration, if any, should be given to the internal conditions in the United States? It is with reference to this issue, Mr. President, that I have today offered an amendment.

In the course of the last several months I have received not hundreds but thousands of letters from those who fought on the battlefields to protect this country, and who are even now seeking jobs and homes for themselves and their families. The well-knit, well-financed pressure groups that have flooded this country with propaganda designed to destroy our immigration system, purporting to speak for the American people, tell us that the employment and housing problems of our own people are not to be considered in this issue. I prefer, Mr. President, to listen to the real voice of America—the voice of the vast majority of the American people, thousands upon thousands of whom have expressed to me their increasing concern because of displacement of American citizens from jobs and housing by the hundreds of thousands of aliens who are arriving on our shores. Right there, may I say, as I have previously pointed out, that the Displaced Persons Commission in passing on job and housing assurances, required by the present law, has been validating blanket assurances for jobs and housing with no independent investigation to ascertain whether or not the jobs or housing actually exist.

Notwithstanding the stimulation of employment in the United States due to the unprecedented expenditures of this Government, both at home and abroad, unemployment in this country has increased over one and one-half million since the end of 1948, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics estimated unemployment in July of 1949 to be 4,100,000, which was by far the highest unemployment figure in this country since 1942. The statistics in December 1949 reflect a temporary decline in unemployment to three and one-half million. The effect of one part of my amendment would be to prohibit the issuance of visas under the proposed Displaced Persons Act when the total number of unemployed in the labor force of the United States exceeded 4,000,000. In my judgment, this is the least we can do to protect the job of the American workingman.

I am aware of the fact, Mr. President, that generally the addition of several hundred thousand to the labor force will not appreciably affect the over-all statistics on unemployment, but it must be recognized that this is a marginal group of newcomers whose competition for job opportunities affects principally our own citizens in the lower income brackets. Beyond that—and I impress upon the Senate the earnestness of my contention—if we embark on a course of opening our doors to displaced persons other than the war displaced persons—the stream will become a river and the river will become a flood. If anyone in or out of the Senate takes issue with this contention, I invite his attention to the vilification to which I have been subjected by the pressure groups in my endeavors to maintain our protective immigration system against those who would destroy it.

In April 1949 it was estimated that 2,040,000 married couples were doubled up in dwelling units in the United States. Since that time it is probable that, due to housing construction, this number has been somewhat reduced. These statistics, as every Member of the Senate knows, are only an indication of the housing needs, both present and potential, of this country. Is it not, Mr. President, proper for the Senate to concern itself with this fact in considering legislation to add thousands upon thousands of families, in addition to the thousands who are coming under our general immigration laws, who will be seeking housing in this country?

The effect of another part of my amendment would be to prohibit the issuance of visas under the proposed Displaced Persons Act when the total number of married couples living doubled up in a household with another family exceeded 2,000,000.

Mr. President, I shall, when the bill is debated in this Senate, express myself forthrightly on each of the many issues, including the issue of the impact on our democratic institutions by unassimilable blocks of aliens with foreign ideologies. I have offered this amendment because I am convinced that, irrespective of the decision of the Senate on the other issues, it is essential as a minimum safeguard to protect the people of the United States of America.

Mr. President, I send the amendment forward, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in full as a part of my remarks in the body of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table, and, without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. MCCARRAN is as follows:

At the end of the bill add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 16. (a) No visa shall be issued pursuant to this act, as amended, to any eligible displaced person at any time after 1 week immediately following the certification of a declaration, as provided in subsection (b) of this section stating that either (1) the total number of unemployed in the labor force in the United States exceeds 4,000,000 as estimated by the Secretary of Labor, or (2) the total number of married couples living doubled-up in a household with another family exceeds 2,000,000 as estimated by the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

"(b) During the month next following the month in which this section is enacted, and each month thereafter until July 1951, the Secretary of Labor shall certify and make public a declaration setting forth his estimate of the total number of unemployed in the labor force in the United States, and the Administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency shall certify and make public a declaration setting forth his estimate of the total number of married couples living doubled-up in a household with another family. The declaration so certified shall be published promptly in the Federal Register.

"(c) The term 'another family' as used in this section means the head of a household whether or not related to either member of the married couple. The term 'household' as used in this section means a house, an apartment, or other group of rooms, or a room that constitutes a dwelling unit."

CODIFICATION OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4080) to unify, consolidate, revise, and codify the Articles of War, the Articles for the Government of the Navy, and the disciplinary laws of the Coast Guard, and to enact and establish a Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] is going to move tomorrow that House bill 4080 be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. As a member of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate, to which committee the bill was referred in the first instance, I shall support the motion of the Senator from Nevada, because it is my opinion that the bill should never have been referred to the Armed Services Committee in the first instance. The bill covers many basic questions involving the administration of justice in this country, and I see no reason why questions as to judicial right on the part of men in the armed services should be considered by any committee other than the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate.

My experience in connection with the bill further convinces me, Mr. President, that it ought to have been submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary in the first instance. I speak as a member of the Armed Services Committee, and as a member of the subcommittee of that committee which conducted hearings on the bill when I say I hope that tomorrow the motion of the Senator from Nevada will be adopted, because I should like to have the contents of the bill and the implications of the bill, insofar as the administration of American justice is concerned, considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. I happen to be one who believes that we should not draw the type of curtain between civilian and military justice that is drawn by this bill. I think the standing committee of the Senate which has jurisdiction over questions of the administration of American justice should have the bill assigned to it.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I wish to say at this time that if the Senate should decide tomorrow not to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary for further study by that committee, which committee, in my judgment, is best versed in questions of the administration of justice, then I shall ask consideration of a series of amendments to the bill, which I now send to the desk and ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JENNER in the chair). The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I urge the Senate to give the most careful consideration to these amendments because although they bear my name, after all, they are not, in the main, the product of my pen; they are the result of very careful study and consideration which has been given to the problem of military justice by an appropriate committee of the American Bar Association.

I should like to say, Mr. President, that I think the interest of the American Bar Association and the demonstrated proof time and time again of its insistence upon setting up a sound system of American justice, should recommend to the Senate of the United States the most careful consideration of the amendments which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I will yield in a moment.

I have conferred at length with members of the American Bar Association who have urged upon me the importance of seeing to it that certain changes are made in House bill 4080 before it is passed by the Senate. They have convinced me that those changes are necessary. Therefore, if the bill is not referred to the Committee on the Judiciary tomorrow, I shall want to speak, as briefly as possible, but as long as necessary, to see to it that a record in support of the amendments is made for the consideration of the Senate. I sincerely hope that because of the importance of the issues involved in the bill the Senate will not agree to proceed to any vote on the bill, at least tomorrow.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Oregon has offered amendments at this time, which he has asked to have printed and lie on the table. I am wondering—and I should like to ask as a matter of information—if the amendments were offered in the Committee on Armed Services?

Mr. MORSE. The subject matters of the amendments were offered. Representatives of the American Bar Association, as the record of the hearings will show, testified before the subcommittee. But the recommendation of the witnesses of the American Bar Association were not approved by the subcommittee.

Mr. LUCAS. What I was wondering was whether these specific amendments were offered to the committee as a whole, and whether the amendments were voted up or down in the committee room.

Mr. MORSE. The committee did not vote on them in their present form. But the record will show clearly that the objectives and principles of these amendments were before the committee for debate and consideration.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to have the floor in my own right.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think I have made clear the position I shall take on the motion made by the Senator from Nevada to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on the amendments, if that motion should fail.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, without delaying the Senate tonight, I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois, in response to his inquiry, that I, too, was a member of the subcommittee, and it is my feeling that if the Senator from Illinois will read in tomorrow's RECORD the speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], he will find the substance of the proposed amendments of the Senator from Oregon discussed, with their background. Although I agree with the Senator from Oregon that the amendments were not offered as such, the subject matter of the amendments, in general, if I understand what he intends to offer, was considered.

I should like to say in reply to the Senator from Oregon—and I do this because I too was a member of the subcommittee—that I hope the motion of the Senator from Nevada to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee will not prevail. I shall give my reasons in three sentences, so that the Senator from Oregon may have the answer very briefly in the RECORD.

Mr. President, the subject of military justice is one which falls wholly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services. This opinion is based on my interpretation of the jurisdictions of the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on the Judiciary as set forth in the Legislative Reorganization Act, and based on long-standing precedents. It will be found that in the past 50 years all questions on this subject have been considered as falling within the jurisdiction of the Committees on Armed Services or their predecessor committees. In the Eightieth Congress, the Committee on Armed Services had jurisdiction over the bill which ultimately became Public Law 759, and also over proposed amendments to the Articles for the Government of the Navy. Legislation on military justice was before the Military Affairs Committees in 1912, 1913, 1916, 1919, 1937, and 1942.

For those reasons, very briefly, Mr. President, I shall vote against any motion to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I should like to make a very brief reply to my good friend from Massachusetts. I do not quarrel with the citation of precedents. I quarrel with the advisability of following those precedents, in view of the problems which have existed for decades with respect to military justice.

Mr. President, the very fact that in the past so-called military justice legislation has been considered by the Armed Services Committees of the Congress, instead of by the Judiciary Committees, is one of the reasons, in my opinion, I say most respectfully, why there have developed in this country really two sets of justice, so-called—one for civilian and another for military personnel.

From 1936 to 1939, as director and administrator I conducted a Nation-wide prison survey for the United States Department of Justice. I know, as a result of my experience in connection with that survey that it is high time—in fact, it is long overdue—that we bring about a uniformity of principle in the administration of criminal justice, covering both civilians and military personnel.

In my judgment some shocking conditions exist as the result of the two-system administration of justice in America. We should have great interest in a civilian who goes into uniform and is subject to the rules of military justice. The experiences which we developed in the last war were so shocking in some respects that we had to establish special clemency boards at the close of the war to rectify some of the grave injustices which developed in connection with the administration of military justice during the war.

As I shall say at much greater length when the debate proceeds, whether a man wears a uniform or a business suit, he is entitled to the protection afforded by the fundamental principles of American justice which I believe were contemplated when the Constitution was adopted.

Some of the excesses of the military in the administration of military justice in the history of this country are simply shocking. As a Member of the Senate I shall raise my voice in doing what I can to see to it that the basic principles of justice advocated by the American Bar Association are written into any court-martial bill passed by the Congress.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Illinois had this bill made the unfinished business, he was hopeful, from his discussion with members of the Armed Services Committee, that we might be able to conclude consideration of the bill today. It now seems, as the result of what my distinguished friend from Oregon has said, that we may not be able to finish the bill tomorrow. However, I hope that we can vote tomorrow at the earliest possible moment upon the motion which will be made by the Senator from Nevada, in order that we may ascertain what action the Senate will take upon the motion. If the motion should be defeated—and I am hopeful that it will be—we can then proceed to debate the amendments and the bill itself. I sincerely hope that we may be able to conclude the debate tomorrow. I do not like to hold the Senate in session late in the evening during the early part of the session, but I had what I thought was an almost absolute assurance that we could conclude consideration of the bill in not to exceed 2 days, or perhaps 1 day. However, I am not complaining about that, because I well recognize that every Senator has the right to speak as long as he desires upon any amendment or the bill itself.

I hope that my good friend from Oregon will debate his amendments as expeditiously as possible, with a view to attempting to finish tomorrow afternoon, or perhaps some time in the evening. I do not want to hold a night session, but I should like to see the bill passed, if possible, tomorrow. If we cannot, of course, we shall have to continue over until another day.

I have made an agreement with the Senators from California [Mr. DOWNEY and Mr. KNOWLAND] and the Senators from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. MCFARLAND] that we would take up on Monday a bill in which those Senators are very much interested. I am sure that they would not object to delaying that bill a short while so that we may conclude consideration of the pending bill if we must finish it on Monday. However, it is my sincere hope that we may be able to complete it tomorrow.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, February 3, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 2 (legislative day of January 4), 1950:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., the Chaplain, offered the following prayer:

Most merciful and gracious God, grant that this moment of prayer may be one of insight and of inspiration.

We pray that we may incarnate the spirit of our blessed Lord and bear testimony to the splendor of His ideals and principles as we strive to build a nobler civilization.

We humbly confess that in this high adventure we so frequently put our confidence solely in human wisdom and human ingenuity and fail to lay hold of those spiritual resources which Thou hast placed at our disposal.

May it be the passionate longing of our hearts to lead groping and struggling humanity out of darkness and confusion into the glorious light and liberty of the children of God.

To Thy name we ascribe all the praise. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDaniel, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 322. An act to transfer funds to the town of Craig, Alaska;

H. R. 746. An act for the relief of the legal guardian of August Michela, a minor;

H. R. 2585. An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide for exemption from duty of certain metallic impurities in tin ores and concentrates when such impurities are not recovered;

H. R. 4387. An act to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Treasury Department; and

H. R. 6212. An act to amend section 5 of the Federal Firearms Act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 587. An act for the relief of the estate of Dick Walook, Alfred L. Woods, and Edward Kimoktoak;

H. R. 3946. An act to promote the national defense and to contribute to more effective aeronautical research by authorizing professional personnel of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to attend accredited graduate schools for research and study; and

H. R. 4106. An act for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while in the course of their respective duties, suffered losses of personal property by reason of war conditions.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 947. An act for the relief of the Baggett Transportation Co., Inc.;

S. 1059. An act for the relief of John W. Wagner;

S. 1146. An act for the relief of Francis W. Dodge;

S. 1423. An act for the relief of Alex Morningstar;

S. 1769. An act to reimburse the Stebbins Construction Co.;

S. 1863. An act for the relief of Fremont Rider;

S. 1933. An act for the relief of C. L. Leffingwell and others;

S. 2070. An act for the relief of the Clark Funeral Home;

S. 2314. An act to provide for holding a term of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon at Eugene;

S. 2339. An act for the relief of the Davis Grocery Co., of Oneida, Tenn.;

S. 2385. An act for the relief of Edward C. Ritche;

S. 2507. An act to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to grant to the East Bay municipal utility district, an agency of the State of California, an easement for the construction and operation of an interceptor sewer pipe line in and under certain Government-owned lands comprising a part of the Maritime Alameda Shipyard, Alameda, Calif.;

S. 2520. An act to authorize the sale of certain allotted devised land on the Winnebago Reservation, Nebr.; and

S. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. REGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

[Mr. REGAN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RICHARDS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include an address delivered by Hon. Emmet O'Neal and a newspaper article.

Mr. LYNCH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEOGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PERKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials appearing in the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Mr. HELLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and to include extraneous matter in three.

Mrs. KELLY of New York asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a magazine article.

THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

Mr. CAVALCANTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAVALCANTE. Mr. Speaker, nearly one-half million of our fellow men in this Nation go down to the collieries to work. For the first 11 months of 1949 the friends of the Taft-Hartley law have upon their heads the blood of 534 of these our fellow men who went down to the collieries, never to return alive. In view of this, how Hitlerlike and macabre is the voice of the colossus from Winchester who calls on the President to invoke that infamous law against these fellow men and to "handle arrogant labor leaders like Governor Tuck did here in Virginia."

Verily, Mr. Speaker, the hand that handled the labor leaders in Virginia was (sic) indeed the hand of Tuck, but the voice that commanded the hand of Tuck was truly the voice of the colossus—Hitlerlike and macabre. It is the prototype of this colossus that is undermining democratic government by refusing to yield obedience to the limitations on States' rights contained in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of this democratic Government. Men of honest minds rejoice in the sane decision of the President not to use the infamous Taft-Hartley law.

HOOVER COMMISSION

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I have consistently advocated the adoption of most of the Hoover proposals and shall continue to support the adoption of the remaining ones, which, in my opinion, will effect real economies and eliminate overlapping and provide for efficient consolidation. However, I wish strongly to protest the recommendations of the Hoover Commission relative to the proposals that would divide the functions of the Veterans' Administration. I have served overseas in combat in both world wars. As an ex-serviceman, I am familiar with the problems that the veterans are faced with in attempting to secure those benefits that the Congress has made available to them. After the First World War, I had the honor to represent my district in Congress. During those early postwar years, 80 percent of my correspondence consisted of requests from ex-servicemen enlisting my aid in securing proper adjudication of their claims. It was not an easy matter then, as all the records were centralized and the servicemen had not been adequately instructed on how to proceed. Under the present Veterans' Administration, aid to the servicemen is made more readily available through regional offices throughout the Nation. A complete file is kept on each veteran in a regional office near to his home. This procedure has resulted in more efficient service to the veteran—a great contrast in comparison with conditions after the First World War. The Hoover proposals would transfer the loan-guaranty activities of the VA to the Housing and Home Finance Agency. They would create a veterans' insurance corporation and would consolidate all veteran medical programs with those of other Government agencies into one united medical administration. This, in my opinion, would cause veterans' cases to lose their identities as such, in that a veteran's claim would not necessarily get the preference that it would be entitled to, and thus the intent of Congress in enacting specific veterans' legislation for the welfare of those who carried the brunt of the battles would be thwarted. Servicemen's welfare was sadly neglected in a matter of only a few years after the end of World War I. It would be a great catastrophe to allow these same conditions to prevail under the guise of economy. I firmly believe in real economy measures within the administration of veterans' affairs that would not deny the veterans those benefits that Congress intended for them to have. By continuing to have a separate and complete Veterans' Administration, the people of the Nation can have a definite agency to turn to in order to find out how adequately the veterans are being taken care of. This separate organization would be fixed in the public mind as the agency charged with the responsibility of administering veterans' affairs. Should the various functions of the Veterans' Administration be dispersed amongst other governmental and primarily nonveteran agencies, there would exist not one agency that could be held responsible for, and held accountable to the American people for, the administration of veterans' affairs. I think that the Hoover proposals in this matter should not be adopted for the reasons given, but, instead, this same Commission should investigate the possibilities of reorganizing the various departments of the Veterans' Administration itself in relation to the entire administration of veterans' affairs in order to eliminate any overlapping or duplication of functions and the elimination of any waste. The intent of Congress should not be thwarted by any false economy moves when these economies can be made within the present set-up.

LINCOLN DAY BOX SUPPER

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand this morning a most peculiar and interesting newspaper clipping.

An advertisement in a Washington newspaper reads as follows:

Lincoln Day box supper, Uline Arena, Monday, February 6, 6:30 p. m. Everybody welcome.

Fred Waring and his Pennsylvanians, George Murphy and Robert Montgomery, joint masters of ceremonies.

Round and square dancing.

Admission tickets, $1 plus tax—complete chicken dinner box lunch, $1 additional.

Tickets available: 1115 National Press Building, 1604 Twentieth Street NW., Waters Travel Agency, 1603 K Street NW., telephones NA. 6280, CO. 8151.

What, oh, what, has become of the trumpeting elephant that was once the Republican Party? An ad for a Lincoln Day dinner without a mention of the Grand Old Party. I have not felt so old since Shirley Temple had a baby.

Could it be that Republicans have suddenly grown self-conscious of the deep rift between the philosophy of Lincoln and the moribund policies they pursue in narrowing circles? Could this be a new and modest humility? I doubt it.

It seems more likely that the motives here are of the pocketbook rather than the heart. It is just possible that the Republicans are interested in making money—that they are at last aware of the jeopardy in which the GOP places anything with which its name is associated.

One of the Nation's finest orchestras will be present. Two noted masters of ceremonies will keep things moving swiftly and smoothly. There will be round and square dancing for all—topped off by a dollar chicken dinner.

Why spoil it all with Republicans?

Blazon everybody welcome in your ads and hope that entertainment will do what Republican policies have not been able to do—win a large and appreciative audience.

And have people buy their tickets from travel agencies instead of party headquarters. I suggest a ticket agency in a moving firm's office might also be convenient to a large number of Republicans.

While I applaud the wisdom of this ad and the growing timidity of the minority party, I shed a single tear of farewell.

Gone is my youth when a wild elephant trumpeted through these halls to rescue Pauline from the perils of welfare legislation. In his place sits a titmouse.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin to speak again?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TAURIELLO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a bill he introduced.

Mr. RODINO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include editorials.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington (at the request of Mr. MANSFIELD) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article on the fishery activities under the Fish and Wildlife Service, notwithstanding the fact that it is estimated by the Public Printer to exceed two pages of the RECORD and cost $184.50.

Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

[Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. McKINNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKINNON. Mr. Speaker, no nation is so great it can afford to forget solemn promises. Twice during the past 50 years American men and women have been called upon to crush the threat of aggressors.

We can never repay our debt to those who died and sacrificed that we might have freedom. We must not forget this obligation when all of us are searching for ways to reduce our Federal budget.

Thus far, I have voted for every reorganization bill based upon the Hoover Commission report. But the proposal to scatter the powers and functions of the Veterans' Administration lacks perception, is unjust to the veteran, and will not achieve economy.

We have promised the veteran adequate medical aid. Under this new proposal, he will not get it. We have promised the veteran specialized study and care in many of his problems. Under this new proposal, he will not get it.

I have confidence our President will spot this particular proposal as a backward move. It will not achieve economy—and more important, it will not be for the welfare of the veteran. As great as we are, we still must keep our pledges.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ENGLE of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SUTTON addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLMER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. YOUNG asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a short newspaper article.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. YOUNG asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes on Monday next after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. DONDERO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

LINCOLN DAY DINNER

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, something has been said here this morning about the Republican box social which is to be held next Monday night here in Washington, to the effect that it was a money-making affair. I can assure the people of the United States that when you charge $1 for admission and $1.20 for a chicken dinner in Washington, it is not the money-making affair that it is when they charge $100 a plate for a Jefferson day dinner. As far as the Republican Party is concerned, we have not forgotten the philosophy of Abraham Lincoln half as much as that part of the Democratic Party which has gone left wing and literally and completely forgotten and abandoned the philosophy and tradition of Thomas Jefferson, a man whom we all admire.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include some excerpts.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a very interesting letter from one of my constituents to the Cleveland Press in the matter of paying his taxes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, letters are pouring into my office from people of the Twenty-second District of Ohio urging that something be done about the coal situation. These letters tell many shocking stories, and reveal that the country is, indeed, facing an emergency as our coal piles grow smaller and smaller.

Most serious of all is the threat to the health of our people resulting from insufficient heat in homes and offices, and hot water to meet daily needs.

Not alone are many people without coal for their furnaces, but industries today are faced with having to curtail operations to meet the dwindling coal supplies. When power companies are without coal, power is cut off and all enterprise depending upon electricity is helpless. When industry is without coal, it must eventually shut down, throwing thousands of people out of work. Such things must not come to pass.

I am not assessing the reasons for the long inaction, I am merely citing the facts which grow increasingly serious. Action of some kind must come, and soon. The law is there, the power for the President to act is there. Unquestionably there must be reasons on both sides for the disastrous stalemate. It is difficult to understand that men will die on the field of battle but will not yield their prejudices, even though suffering be the result.

In the hope that some solution will be found immediately, I am adding my voice to those already raised in protest against this intolerable situation.

REPEAL OF WARTIME EXCISE TAXES

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, if Congress fails to proceed immediately to repeal wartime excise taxes, losses to business enterprises affected by these taxes will be enormous.

The wide publicity given to the subject has practically resulted in a buyers' strike. Many firms are operating at a loss; some have been compelled to go out of business, resulting in unemployment as well as great financial loss. I am reliably informed that the jewelry business in my district is down approximately 30 to 40 percent from 1946 and 1947. Other industries have suffered in varying proportions.

The losses to which I refer have by no means been confined to the so-called luxury items. Dealers in the more essential products are also concerned over these unfair and discriminatory taxes. As a particular indication of unfairness, it should be remembered that taxes on transportation and communications were not levied in the first instance to produce revenue. They were assessed solely to discourage wartime travel and to make all systems of communications more readily available for war purposes. Yet we are told by the President that before even these taxes can be repealed provision must be made for other taxes to take their place.

I challenge the right of President Truman to tell Congress he will veto any legislation repealing wartime excise taxes unless legislation to replace them is simultaneously enacted as a substitute. I quite agree that loopholes in our present tax structure should be thoroughly explored. However, this will take time if an effective job is to be done. The repeal of wartime excise taxes can be quickly accomplished. There is no reason whatever for joining both proposals in a single tax-relief bill. There is no valid excuse for further delay.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include three articles which I handed in yesterday.

Also, to extend my remarks and include in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Samuel Pettingill. Sam Pettingill was one of the finest Members of Congress that I ever associated with, a Democrat from Indiana who believed in the teachings of Jefferson and carries them out to the best of his ability.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances and to include excerpts.

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include resolutions of the Farm Bureau from his home county.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE HOOVER COMMISSION WITH REFERENCE TO VETERANS

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, the various veterans' organizations in the country are objecting to one of the recommendations of the Hoover Commission. They assert that this recommendation if carried into effect will work a severe hardship on disabled veterans and those needing hospitalization.

I want to commend the leaders of these organizations for the thorough study they have given to the subject before they announced their opposition to this one section of the Hoover report. I have read the statements made by the American Legion and other veterans' organizations on this subject and I feel they made a good case. It shall be my purpose to assist them in their efforts.

The people are strong for the recommendations made by the Hoover Commission and, likewise, they want to do justice to the veterans, especially those who are disabled and those who are in need of medical care and hospitalization.

I think Congress can work out a plan that will meet the wishes of the veterans and not seriously disturb the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

PENNSYLVANIA GROUND HOGS

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, this is ground-hog day. This is the day when the great marmot will be consulted by savants, far and wide, even as the ancients consulted their oracles, in order to receive his prognostications on what we may expect of the weather for the next 6 weeks. Should this eminent authority on atmospheric change see his shadow, he will return to his subterranean abode and 6 weeks more of winter weather can confidently be expected.

One of the outstanding institutions in my congressional district is that great public-spirited body known as the Slumbering Ground-Hog Lodge of Quarryville, which has its locale in the nationally known agricultural area of Lancaster County, Pa. This year the lodge is promoting the Ground-Hog Bowl—a national project—as preeminent among its many concerns for American development. It has also taken note that John L. Lewis has raided ground-hog legend and now has his miners "hibernate" all but 3 days of each week. Incidentally, the lodge last year adopted Me and My Shadow as the musical score best expressing its aims and ideals.

Knowing as I do the traditions surrounding the Slumbering Ground-Hog Lodge and the unfailing accuracy of its prognosticator, I would be remiss in proper civic pride and my unquestioned congressional duty were I to fail to spike the canard being circulated by my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Congressman LEON H. GAVIN, of our Nineteenth Pennsylvania District, who has attempted to assign to that puny and pusillanimous pig of Punxsutawney, which he has the effrontery to call a ground hog, qualities superior to those of the prognosticating patriarch of my district. The simple fact of the matter is that the Punxsutawney animal has become infused with rabbit blood and has become a very timid creature, indeed. It is actually so scary that when startled it plunges headlong into its burrow, with the result that it has to back out, thus considerably delaying its observation of the sun. On the other hand, the Quarryville ground hog — known among the Pennsylvania Dutch brethren as "der grosser grundsow"—is a fearless animal and constantly stands defiantly just inside the entrance to his cave so that he is immediately ready to observe the solar orb as it rises above the horizon and at once gives his prediction. In fact, his promptness and accuracy are so noted that the Weather Bureau maintains a direct wire to his station, whereas the Punxsutawney punk will have to wait until rural telephones are extended to his area under REA, which will probably be in about 50 years.

To conclude, may I confidently suggest that for accurate weather forecasts consult the Quarryville ground hog, and for a practical demonstration of the American way of life stop over for a look around Pennsylvania's Ninth District.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN].

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a great respect and high admiration for my very able and good friend and colleague, PAUL DAGUE, of the Pennsylvania delegation, and I might say that ordinarily it would be beneath my dignity to reply to the scurrilous attack that has been made on the one and only ground hog—the Punxsutawney ground hog who has been making unquestioned weather predictions for the past 100 years.

I resent the attitude taken by my very good friends CLARENCE BROWN and TOM JENKINS, of Ohio, on the Greenville, Ohio, ground hog. And my good friend, PAT SUTTON, of Tennessee, even had the audacity to discuss with me a Tennessee ground hog. Also my good friends, BROOKS HAYS and OREN HARRIS, of Arkansas, tried to cut in for some publicity on their chuckship with the Arkansas hound dog.

To reply, I can best do so to these vociferous attacks on the Punxsutawney ground hog by bringing to the attention of the Members a wire I received from a very honorable citizen and distinguished doctor of great renown, Dr. F. A. Lorenzo, president of the Punxsutawney Ground Hog Club. Here is his wire:

> Since the Punxsutawney ground hog ascended the weather throne at Gobblers Knob nearly a century ago, petty, prevaricating pretenders with pediculosis have pecked peevishly at this position as premier prognosticator. Pay no never mind to the petulant pretentions of pestiferous, piebald pilgrims for piggeries parading as progeny of Punxsutawney's peerless prophet. Phooey on the philandering, puling peccaries. Also puf, phew, and pooh-pooh to the perfidious plagiarists.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENSES

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, who are we to trust for accurate information as to the state of our national security? When is the administration going to give us a true appraisal of our defenses?

The Secretary of Defense, in his annual report to the President and the Congress, issued just the other day, said:

> I am pleased to report to the President, to the Congress, and to the American people, that their defenses have never been in a more favorable condition in time of peace. The state of readiness of our armed forces and the military potential of our country are greater today than in any previous peacetime period in our Nation's history.

The Secretary of the Air Force yesterday declared, in effect, that we are at the mercy of the Communist military might. He declared that behind the iron curtain there is the ability to launch an atomic attack against any part of the United States, and that we have no sure defense against such an attack.

I am not in a position to question the accuracy of the statements of either of these men.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is: What is the state of our defenses?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MCGREGOR asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an illustration of the effect of hidden taxes on the price the consumer pays for gas and electric ranges.

Mr. LEFEVRE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include two editorials.

DEAN ACHESON

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, before Dean Acheson assumed the office of Secretary of State he took the following solemn oath of office:

> I do solemnly swear, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter, so help me God.

Mr. Speaker, when some few days ago Secretary of State Acheson expressed his confidence in Alger Hiss despite the latter's conviction in a New York Federal court for perjury in denying he had given American secrets to Russian spies, he was not speaking for himself, but as Secretary of State of the Government of the United States. This reprehensible action on the part of Dean Acheson is definitely a violation of his oath of office and especially that part of the oath where he swore to defend the United States against all enemies foreign and domestic.

We all know that the members of our armed forces from the birth of this Nation, have taken the same oath that Dean Acheson took when he was entrusted with the affairs of the Department of State.

We recall the fate of Benedict Arnold when in the uniform of his country he sought to betray it to our enemy. Have you any difficulty in imagining the fate that would have befallen a comrade of Benedict Arnold who would seek to whitewash him after he was convicted of treason?

In my opinion, Alger Hiss is a twentieth century Benedict Arnold, and Dean Acheson in taking him to his bosom, reveals that he approves Hiss' disregard of the responsibilities and obligations of American citizenship.

If Dean Acheson lacks the decency to resign, and President Truman refuses to request his resignation, then it behooves Congress to impeach him. Too long has the cloak of suspicion shrouded the State Department and it is time that the American people assert themselves before it is too late.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LOVRE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LICHTENWALTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech by a former Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article entitled "Our Fiscal Crisis—What Can We Do With It?" notwithstanding that it exceeded two pages of the RECORD and, according to the Public Printer, costs $205 to print.

THE MARSHALL PLAN

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, as every Member of this House well knows, the Marshall plan was sold to the public on the theory that it would promote economic cooperation between the western European nations; first, by giving immediate relief from the war destruction; and secondly, to place the countries involved in a position to reestablish themselves economically.

Of course, real economic progress in that particular area will never be accomplished until there is stability of currency as between the individual western European nations.

Some of these countries have earnestly sought to bring about a local currency union, thus making unnecessary bilateral agreements.

Now England comes along, although we have poured billions into that little country, and kicks over the traces and refuses to go along with the union on the grounds that she cannot take such a step until after the British general election.

The American taxpayer and other countries of western Europe are in no position to continually carry these loads and to throw additional billions of dollars into the effort while waiting for England to get her house in order. The western European countries should go along with the perfection of the local currency union and thus consolidate their economic effort and get on their way toward some stability. Even the old enemies—France and Germany—are going along and the union is to include the Benelux countries.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

[Mr. FORD addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

ANTIDISCRIMINATION LAWS

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIAM L. PFEIFFER] called attention to the fact that there are 10 States in which so-called antidiscrimination laws are on the statute books. This indicates that we have a considerable experience which we can draw upon in terms of writing such a Federal law.

In that connection I recently asked the Legislative Reference Service to provide an analysis and a comparison of the committee bill H. R. 4453, of H. R. 6841, and of the Massachusetts law of 1946. I intend to include that in an extension in the Appendix so that those who are interested may examine it. I expect also to have the three annual reports of the Massachusetts Commission since its creation, and to include them in the Appendix so that we can see what is being done in one of our States in this field. I hope this material will be helpful to all of my colleagues who are interested in providing the best possible legislation in this connection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. WEICHEL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a joint resolution she is introducing today commemorating the one hundred seventy-fifth anniversary of Patriots Day in Massachusetts.

Mr. CHURCH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; in one to include an address by Dean McBurney, and in the other a letter from a constituent.

Mr. PHILBIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address.

Mr. GATHINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials appearing in the Arkansas Gazette.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address he delivered in Fredericksburg, Va.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

[Mr. ROONEY addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

[Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts addressed the House. Her remarks appear in the Appendix.]

TRIBUTE TO THE ARKANSAS DOG

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing for my two friends, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAGUE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN], to exhaust themselves in a verbal exchange over the relative merits of the groundhogs of Quarryville and Punxsutawney. But when the gentleman from Pennsylvania mentions the Arkansas hound dog, my hackles are up. It looks like the pursuit of the malevolent attack that was made more than a year ago by one of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania upon the Arkansas hound dog. Of course, the Arkansas hound dog is superior to this timid and capricious quadruped from Quarryville. The Arkansas farmer can always tell in the morning by the angle of the tail, by the tilt of the head, and by the way the hound dog sniffs the fragrant air in the piney woods what the weather will be. I would like to remind him that if all the hound dogs of Arkansas were one dog, he could stand on the highest peak of the Alleghenies and raise a howl that would blow the rings off the planet Saturn, and all the ground hogs of Quarryville and Punxsutawney could not cast a shadow across that hound dog's left hind leg.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. BECKWORTH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a table with reference to enemy property, notwithstanding the fact that it is estimated by the Government Printer to exceed 2 pages of the RECORD at a cost of $348.50.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

AID FOR NEEDY STUDENTS

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD..

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to bring to the attention of the House H. R. 5852, introduced last August by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FURCOLO], which calls for extending loans to enable needy and scholastically qualified students to continue their education. This bill seeks to establish a Federal scholarship fund, which is to be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of extending loans to needy students. Such loans shall not exceed $1,000 per year for the first 4 years of study in an educational institution on the college level, and no more than $1,500 per year in a postgraduate institution. The loans are to be repaid in regular periodic payments over a 10-year term.

The Commissioner of Education will be required to make annual reports to Congress as to the administration of this act, when and if it becomes effective, and will be required to submit detailed information concerning the status of this student fund. Incidentally, I am pleased to note that the bill contains a section which provides that there is to be no discrimination against applicants on racial or religious grounds.

I think the members of this House will be interested in the following information, submitted to me by Commissioner of Education Earl J. McGrath, on money loaned to students under Public Law 647, enacted by the Seventy-seventh Congress. Here are the Commissioner's figures:

Total amount of loans granted	$3,335,521.14
Total collections (principal)	$1,885,739.52
Total cancellations	$120,971.80
Balance due	$1,328,809.82
Interest received to date	$207,439.19
Number of students granted loans	11,044

He also informs me that, on the basis of past experience, the possibility for collecting the outstanding balance is very favorable. Many of the loans were deferred for several years on two grounds: First, during the period of military service of the borrower; and second, the establishment of the Veterans Administration's program of education. Final payments in many instances are due in 1952, but on some loans final payment many not come until some time later.

Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent record. Analysis of the figures discloses that almost 57 percent of the principal has been repaid, and if you add to that the interest received it comes to almost two-thirds of the original loans granted. This speaks very favorably for continuation of such loans on a wide basis as suggested in H. R. 5852. This is the kind of investment which will not only pay for itself in the long run, but from which this country will derive untold benefits and our youth will receive all possible aid and opportunities afforded by no other nation in the world.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, prompted by the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT], I want to say that I despise the man that would betray his country. To defend Alger Hiss is to invite suspicion. The statement made by the Secretary of State to which reference has been made was an insult to the Nation, and made of him a legitimate target for the wrath and scorn of the patriot. Mr. Speaker, the State Department is now and for a long time has been suspect.

PROPOSAL TO ABOLISH THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, instead of going off at a tangent and attempting to amend the Constitution of the United States to abolish the electoral college, we had better get back to the Constitution and get this Government and every official of this Government back to the Constitution.

No wiser group of men ever gathered than that great body presided over by George Washington at Philadelphia that wrote the Constitution of the United States.

When you attempt to abolish the electoral college you are not going to improve anything, you are going to promote chaos and confusion in the various States.

There has never been a President elected, at least in the last 75 years, that there was not a Congress of his own party elected at the same time.

We have amended the Constitution too much now. We had better get back to those great fundamental principles advocated by George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and the other great leaders of the past, quit trying to amend the Constitution, and put a stop to the Supreme Court's setting it aside.

While this amendment is ostensibly directed at the large States of the North, it would more than likely bring back the chaos and confusion of the reconstruction era to the Southern States—if not to all the smaller States in the North and West.

This proposal should be buried so deep that it will never be heard of again—at least, during this generation. The country is not suffering as a result of the electoral college. But it can suffer a great deal as a result of an unwise change.

From that standpoint, as Shakespeare says, we had better—

> Bear those ills we have
> Than fly to others that we know not of.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 457 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, with the Senate amendments thereto be, and the same is hereby, taken from the Speaker's table to the end that the Senate amendments be, and they are hereby, disagreed to and that the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be, and the same is hereby, agreed to.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 32]

Andrews	Jackson, Calif.	Potter
Bland	Kee	Redden
Bonner	Kelley, Pa.	Sabath
Bosone	Kennedy	Sadowski
Brown, Ga.	Kirwan	Scott, Hardie
Bulwinkle	Kunkel	Sikes
Byrne N. Y.	McDonough	Smathers
Celler	Mack, Wash.	Smith, Ohio
Chatham	Macy	Stigler
Chesney	Martin, Mass.	Vorys
Curtis	Meyer	Wadsworth
Gilmer	Monroney	Walsh
Gore	Morrison	White, Idaho
Granger	Murphy	Withrow
Hobbs	Patman

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 387 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] and I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 457, if adopted, will send the oleomargarine bill to conference. The bill passed the House of Representatives and subsequently passed the Senate with amendments. It is now on the Speaker's table. When an effort was made to take it from the Speaker's table and send it to conference, objection was heard.

Consequently, this uncommon procedure is necessary, that is, a resolution from the Rules Committee which, if adopted, will send the bill to conference.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Is the resolution passed by the Rules Committee?

Mr. LYLE. Yes. It originated in the Rules Committee and passed it.

The merits of this bill are not at issue at this time. It is a simple question of whether or not the House will move to take the bill from the Speaker's table and send it to conference.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE] has explained the true situation that now confronts us.

There is no need of me speaking at length. I shall be brief. As far as I am able to learn there is little opposition to the resolution. We have had the subject of oleomargarine before us for a long time. Many speeches have been given for and against the provisions contained in H. R. 2023. I see no reason for another lengthy discussion today. Let us send it to conference.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that this bill will be sent to conference. I felt that we should have a little time in the House to discuss the merits of the legislation before this liquidation of our great dairy industry in the United States begins. Therefore, yesterday I objected to sending the bill to conference by unanimous consent, in order to have time under the rule to discuss the legislation.

The Committee on Agriculture reported out a bill last year in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress which removed the tax from oleomargarine, but it prohibited the shipment of yellow-colored oleomargarine in interstate commerce. When the bill got to the floor it was amended, so that the legislation as it now stands and as it passed the House and Senate provides that oleomargarine can be colored yellow in imitation of butter, but the Senate put certain restrictions in the bill.

I am not only opposed to the rule, but I am opposed to the bill. If I had my way, and we had the votes to do so, the bill would be dead from here on.

It is possible that a good many Members of the House do not appreciate the significance of the legislation proposed by the oleomargarine industry. The fight is over the color yellow. The oleomargarine industry has been permitted to perfect a synthetic product which they claim is as good as butter. By regulation of Paul V. McNutt when he was Security Administrator, the industry was permitted to churn the vegetable oil in milk, to add butter flavor, and to put vitamins in it, so that they claim it has the same vitamin content as butter. Now they want to color it yellow to make oleo look like butter, and thereby perpetrate a fraud on the American people.

There are 28 oleomargarine manufacturers in the country. They are large manufacturers, which also manufacture soap, varnish and paint, because the cottonseed oil that goes into oleomargarine can be used for either purpose. As a matter of fact, oleo can be made, I think, out of fuel oil if they run it through the proper scientific process and it can also be made out of coconut oil.

Those of us who come from the Middle West, where we are engaged in producing large quantities of milk which cannot be sold as fluid milk, must of necessity put between 60 percent to 80 percent of our milk into manufactured products. We have been shut out of the large consuming markets of the country for our milk and cream. Therefore we must take our milk, if we are to continue to produce, and put it into butter and cheese and other dairy products. Our market is being restricted for the sale of these manufactured products and dairy farmers are finding it very, very difficult to continue in dairy farming. The bottom has dropped out in dairy farming.

The milk marketing agreements which were enacted here about 10 years ago have shut us out of these large consuming areas where we could furnish them with cheaper milk if we were permitted to ship our milk and cream into those areas. Under the reciprocal trade law, the President reduced the duty on butter from 14 cents to 7 cents a pound and put a quota of 60,000,000 pounds a year which can be shipped into this country from foreign countries. That lets more cheaply produced foreign butter come into our country at a time when our Government is supporting the price of butter. It is about comparable with the potato situation. The Government is supporting the price of potatoes and during the time that we are supporting the price of potatoes we are also supporting the price for the entire Western Hemisphere and potatoes are coming into this country to the tune of over 5,000,000 bushels in the last few months from Canada. They come here and sell their potatoes a little under the support price and our Government then goes out and buys more potatoes from Maine and other States. That is what we find has developed in the butter situation. The Government now owns over 100,000,000 pounds of butter. On top of that we are restricted out in our section by Government controls in our acreage on wheat and corn.

Most of our farmers, the dairy farmers of the country, are small farmers, operating family-size farms. They are restricted in their acreage and when they cannot go into the production of corn and wheat, of course, they cannot produce cotton and tobacco, why, they are just turned loose without any place to go. We are being liquidated out of the dairy business.

Some say this oleomargarine legislation will not hurt you. Just let me point out to you what it has already done. The per capita consumption of butter 10 years ago was 17 pounds in this country. It has now gone down to around 10 pounds per capita. Oleomargarine consumption has gone from about 2 pounds per capita up to approximately 6 pounds per capita. Oleomargarine has come in and taken the place of butter, a synthetic product, if you please, which is produced by 28 large manufacturers in the United States to the detriment of over 3,000,000 dairy farmers who are producing fluid milk for manufactured products and butter and cheese. Dairy farmers are gradually being liquidated. We have already lost over 3,000,000 dairy cows in this country because of this encroachment upon the spread market in the United States.

The only thing left for the oleo industry is the color yellow. That is what they are fighting to get here. We said that they could take any other color of the spectrum, but they say no, they want yellow to make their synthetic product look like butter. They expect, of course, to capture the market spread in the United States.

If you go up the street here right near the old House Office Building and visit the restaurants there you will find that three-fourths of those restaurants are serving yellow-colored oleomargarine today instead of butter, without any notice at all to their patrons. The patrons pay for butter. One of the proprietors of a restaurant which was serving oleomargarine, when I asked him, said that three-fourths of the restaurants in Washington today are serving yellow-colored oleomargarine, without saying anything to the patrons. The patrons pay for butter.

There are 300,000 public eating houses in the United States. The members of the National Restaurant Association told us that if the unrestricted sale of yellow oleomargarine is permitted, most of those restaurants, or at least three-quarters of them, will serve yellow-colored oleomargarine in place of butter. That further liquidates the dairy industry in the United States, because two-thirds of the milk that leaves the farms must go into butter, cheese, and other products.

I recognize it is futile for me to talk about the practical situation and how it affects so many farmers, because the Democratic Party has made this oleo legislation its No. 1 proposal to put through the Congress. On April 1 of last year it was a fine April-fool present for the dairy farmers, the Democratic yellow oleo bill. I think if you will look up the record, you will find that the farmers of the Midwest were the ones who contributed more to the election of Harry Truman than any other group in this country. When this bill finally becomes law under the signature of President Truman, I suppose there will be great joy among the Democrats for what they have done to millions of dairy farmers. I can assure the Democratic leadership that millions of dairy farmers will not forget.

I would like to see this rule defeated in order to defeat the bill which will liquidate thousands of small dairy farmers and perpetrate a fraud upon American consumers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] has expired.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 33]

Andrews	Chatham	Jackson, Calif.
Bland	Chudoff	Johnson
Blatnik	Curtis	Kelley, Pa.
Bonner	Dingell	Keogh

O'Brien, Mich.	Scott, Hardie	White, Idaho
Patman	Sikes	Wilson, Ind.
Plumley	Simpson, Ill.	Withrow
Potter	Smathers
Powell	Smith, Ohio

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 373 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CHRISTOPHER].

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, of course, like the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN], I realize this bill will go to conference. I realize when I am whipped. There is nothing we can do about it now. However, I am sorry that it passed the House, I am sorry that it passed the Senate, and I am still opposed to it. If I knew of anything I could do to keep it from becoming a law I would certainly do it with the greatest of pleasure, but there is nothing we can do about it now that I can see, so I shall not try to argue against letting the bill go to conference. It would be futile.

As I said on the floor of this House before, oleomargarine is made from soil-depleting crops, and butter is made from soil-conserving crops. The need for soil conservation is a vital need in the country today. I do believe in soil conservation and not soil depletion. We hear a lot of talk everywhere about soil conservation. Folks are doing very little about it. Our soil experts in the United States and in our agricultural colleges and universities tell us it would take $1,500,000,000,000 per year to keep our soil from getting worse than it is, not to make it any better, but just to keep it as it is today.

We were generous here. Very generous. We appropriated $285,00,000 for soil conservation to do a $1,500,000,000 job. We are doing for soil conservation in 5 years what our soil experts say we should do every year. We are spreading lots of lime in the United States, but we would have to spread twice as much lime as we are spreading today in order to break even. It would take two tons of lime instead of one that we are spreading today to hold even the calcium content of our soil as good as it is. What I am trying to say is, we are removing by leeching, erosion, and crops every year twice as much lime as we are spreading. Thousands of acres of land in the United States are under the plow, which ought to be tied down by good grass sod, which is now so poor that it will have to be limed and fertilized and have a crop of sweet clover plowed down on it before it will even grow grass.

You know the oleomargarine industry is a great industry. I am not kicking about the boys from the South who want to see every use in the world made of their cottonseed oil and peanuts but they also should be concerned about their fast-vanishing soil. I want to call your attention to one thing. There is a great soap-manufacturing company in the city of New York, which is the greatest buyer in the United States of the fats and oils that come from the rendering plants where the carcasses that are picked up over the United States in every stage of decomposition are rendered. That soap company makes soap, and it also makes oleomargarine. I hope to God that they keep their troughs pointed in the right direction so some of that fat and oil which is rendered out of those half rotten carcasses does not get into the oleo. I am going to think of that every time I start to eat anything with oleo in it, wondering whether it is made of cottonseed oil and peanut oil or oil which is gotten out of these old rotten carcasses. I would like to know whether that is the case or not. I will keep thinking about it.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DAVIES of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] A quorum is not present.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 370 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

OLEOMARGARINE

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, to start off with, I wish to assure my colleagues that I had nothing to do with this quorum call or any other quorum call this morning.

I have gone through all this battle in the last 2 or 3 years on this oleo bill. I have tried to stick to the facts. I have tried not to be personal with anyone. And, I am sure that, so far as I am concerned, I am just as good a friend of my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] as the day the controversy started. This is not a personal matter, nor is this a sectional question. During all this time I have tried to approach the problem from, first, a scientific angle. I do not care who the man is in the Department of Agriculture or out. There is not a living soul that can say that through experiment it was ever proven that oleo is equal to butter. No one has ever tried to prove it except by using some phony experiment.

The second is from the nutritional angle. With all this new discovery in the last year or two that we have heard about, amino acids, that the doctors are talking to us about, I wonder how many people realize that these dairy products are one of the greatest sources of amino acids?

Then of course we have the economic question, that is always involved. Surely you can sell this oleo cheaper so long as we have a huge subsidy on vegetable oils. No one has disputed the fact that the oil ingredients of oleo have somewhere between 10 and 50 cents a pound subsidy. No one will dispute that. I cannot tell you exactly what it is, but there is no Member here or no one in the Department of Agriculture or no one in the United States who can say that these vegetable oils are not most heavily subsidized. This subsidy is from 10 to 50 cents a pound. Skim milk is provided the oleo manufacturer at less than one-half its relative value.

The newspapers that holler to high heaven about the subsidy programs and how much they cost are the same ones that have been supporting the production and use of this highly subsidized oleo. This applies even to as reliable a paper as the Christian Science Monitor. It is amusing to me to read some of the articles that have been in that great paper.

I do not want to say that we have an antilivestock position in our present Department of Agriculture. I would rather say it in a kinder way, that they have a pro-vegetable-oil complex. If the Agriculture Department had any great interest in the dairy industry, you would not have to have 60-cent butter and 12-cent dry skim milk, set up the way they have worked it out.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks here today to include a letter from the University of Illinois showing the relationship of the value of dry skim milk to butterfat.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS,
COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE,
AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Urbana, Ill., October 24, 1949.

HON. REID F. MURRAY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE MURRAY: Dean Rusk has asked that I send you my views on the question raised in your letter of October 10.

Your stand on the relative value of milk fat and the nonfat solids in fluid milk has considerable merit. Because of its superior flavor, greater ease of concentrating, and wider use, a higher market value has always existed on butterfat than upon the milk solids, not fat. Milk in early times was produced primarily for the cream that could be separated from it. The skim-milk portion was considered a byproduct and was often used for feeding livestock. In more recent times the existence of seasonal and sectional surpluses of milk has had a tendency to perpetuate this early conception of the relative value of the two classes of milk solids, fat and nonfat.

However, the results obtained by modern research workers, particularly those in the field of nutrition, have brought about a somewhat different conception of the relative value of milk fat and milk solids, not fat. Nutritionists now place much more emphasis upon the value of that portion of the milk that lies below the cream layer. The proteins of milk are of excellent biological value. The minerals needed for normal development of the body are more satisfactorily supplied by milk than by dietary calcium. Some of the more important vitamins of milk are water soluble and therefore are associated with the skim-milk portion.

The relative physiological fuel values of the fat and nonfat solids in milk can be calculated readily. For example, in 100 grams of 4-percent milk the fat present would supply 36 calories and the nonfat solids would supply about 33.5 calories. In other words, the fat and nonfat solids of average milk are approximately of equal value from a physiological fuel-value point of view.

A few years ago research workers at your own institution (University of Wisconsin) proposed a method for paying for milk which gave consideration to the percentage of nonfat solids present. One possible reason why such a proposal would not be widely accepted is the lack of a rapid, accurate method for measuring the nonfat solids present in milk.

The price-support plans of the Government were no doubt based upon the going price of butter and powder at the time they were put into effect. The price of these two products in turn is largely based upon the market's conception as to what the consumer will pay for them, coupled with the supply available. The supply of dried milk available depends in part upon how much surplus milk is being diverted into that channel. If the demand for milk for bottling, for ice cream, cheese, or evaporated falls off, more milk is separated for drying and more fat is available for churning. The market price of milk solids, not fat, whether these solids be in the form of sweetened condensed milk, concentrated skim milk, or dried milk, is set pretty largely by the extent to which the supply of these solids exceeds demand during the flush season. Buyers will lay in a supply at that time to take care of their needs for the period that lies ahead.

One important factor that tends to keep the price of milk solids, not fat, from coming closer to that of butter is the fact that they are competitive with other products as far as the food industry is concerned. In other words, the price must be kept low enough that dry milk can compete favorably with solids from vegetable sources.

Most food manufacturers who use dry-milk solids are operating on a rather narrow margin. If the price of dry milk were to be raised to a level nearer that of butter, many of these people would discontinue the use of dried milk. A considerable number of bakers, for example, use dry milk in their doughs. If the price of powder were to be raised to, we will say, 18 cents, many bakers would discontinue its use, even though the price of butter were dropped 5 cents, since bakers use very little butter in their products.

Therefore, it seems that, although the nutritionist can prove there should be less difference in the market price for the fat and nonfat solids contained in milk, the dictates of industry are otherwise. Unless the demand for milk solids, not fat, can be greatly increased over what it is today, the relative market prices of powder and butter will not likely change. If the price of powder is raised beyond what the industrial user thinks is a fair price, he will either discontinue its use or shift to cheaper competitive products.

Please advise if I can be of further service to you in this matter.

Yours very truly,

P. H. TRACY,
Professor, Dairy Technology.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The Agriculture Department provided 60 cents support on butter and 12 cents on dried skim milk. If you read this letter, and they are not my words, you will see that the relationship is wrong. There is no reason in the world why the people of this country should not be entitled to be provided on the basis of 50-cent butter if and when we had an administration that was not so provegetable oil. If the dried skim milk was supported at 20 cents per pound the butter could be supported at 44 cents per pound and still have the farmer receive the same price for his milk.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Has the gentleman ever heard the Secretary of Agriculture say anything in behalf of the farmers who produce milk for butter, in connection with this oleo legislation?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I will say to my colleague from Minnesota, I do not want to——

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Is it not a fact that he has not said a good word for it? Has he?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not want to get into that, but I will say I do not know how thoroughly he has ever studied the dairy industry, so I have always been kind of generous for that reason.

There is another angle in connection with this thing that has not been brought out at all. The other day here on the floor in considering the cotton bill there was something that happened. It happened in connection with two Representatives on this side of the aisle. One was the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and the other was the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN]. They pointed out something in connection with that legislation that is involved in this legislation. It is the human angle that is involved. They indicated that we should think about people once in a while.

When this bill goes through, if we are not careful it will add 1,000,000 people to the unemployed of this country. Whether you like it or whether you do not, that is exactly what is going to happen. They cannot help it. At the present time 10 percent of the dairy industry has been destroyed by the vegetable-oil interests, and it will add another million people to the unemployment rolls of this Nation. Over 10,000,000 people are employed in the dairy industry.

I realize that the world changes, and I realize that in the old days the cartoons have shown the old Republican elephant sitting with the big fat cat sitting beside him. Now, in the last few years, that picture has changed. The poor old elephant has been shoved off his seat, and here we have the donkey sitting beside the fat cat now. Otherwise, no party will penalize the 2,500,000 American dairy farmers out. The biggest cartel, the biggest monopoly the world has ever known, the greatest and largest, and I might say the worst, fat cat in the history of the world would not be found sitting side by side with the Democrat donkey at this time.

We hear much about public health. While some are advocating a need for health legislation, others are out with hammers knocking millions of dairy cattle in the head and sending them to the slaughter pens. The dairy cow is the foster mother of the human race. Milk is the greatest single food known to man. The young, the middle-aged, and the aged should use more of milk and its products for the best health of our people. We should never forget that the dairy cow is the most efficient producer of protective food. She will, from a given amount of feed, produce twice as much human food as any other farm animal, and four times as much as some farm animals.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all in accord. We believe in the pure-food law. We do not believe in fraud. I am sure every Member of the House will agree with me that to permit the oleo people to color their product yellow is stealing a trade-mark. It is a fraud and a perpetration of a fraud upon the public. Who is interested in this fraud?

First there is the housewife. She is ashamed if she uses oleo to admit it to herself and she tries to deceive herself and her husband and her family and wants them to believe they are eating butter instead of oleo because they are ashamed to admit it is oleo. Just a case of self-deception. There must be something awfully rotten about oleo if you have to practice self-deception on yourself in order to satisfy your stomach and try to fool yourself. You should not try to do that. You should at least be fair and honest with yourself. No wonder that some husbands and children get indigestion because they fill their stomachs with fraud and deception. If you like oleo, you ought not to be ashamed of its color.

Next comes the housewife who wants to fool her guests. She wants her guests to think that she is giving them some butter when she is giving them oleo. I am sure you will agree with me that the average housewife should not practice fraud and deception upon her friends and guests. It is wrong to do that. It is self-deception and it is deception upon your guests. If you want to use oleo, use it without deception. No one objects to that and your guests will think more of you in the end.

Then come the big boys who are going to make the millions and millions of dollars out of this fraud and deception by selling oleo to the public at the price of butter. I say to you I feel the Congress should not become a party to such a fraud. Let oleo stand on its own feet. We are in favor of all the taxes being taken off of oleo. We have no objection to that. But why should you take the trade-mark away from butter? It has always been known to have the natural color of yellow.

Some of you say occasionally it is made a little more yellow. Well, we have no objection if you make your oleo black or a little blacker. That would fit the situation because I understand Satan, the arch deceiver, has black garments. But you can dress it up in any way you wish as long as you do not practice deception and fraud. But please do not interfere with the butter's yellow trade-mark. It is wrong to take a trade-mark away from the people who have known it and used it for years and years and years.

If you do, in the long run you will hurt yourself. I do not believe the Congress should become a party and an accomplice before or after the fact of perpetrating a fraud for the benefit of a number of large corporations which have been taking the lead in this fight to grab the trade-mark of butter. I do not blame them if we are foolish enough to let them do that so that they can make their millions of profit.

Here are two letters. One from the Mandan Creamery & Produce Co. and the other from the Cudahy Packing Co. Study them carefully and you will see why this bill should never become a law.

MANDAN CREAMERY & PRODUCE CO.,
Mandan, N. Dak., January 8, 1949.

Hon. WILLIAM LEMKE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEMKE: I note, from the papers, that a new flood of bills have been introduced in Congress for the repeal of the oleo taxes and providing for the sale of colored oleomargarine. In the past 2 years there has been a great deal of ballyhoo, promoted by the cotton oil and cocoanut oil interests, which ballyhoo was picked up by a number of the Members of both Houses in Congress without much thought to the serious consequences resulting.

One little thing has been overlooked in all of the proceedings and in all of the news articles which I have seen, and that is the manner in which certain large interests are able to play both sides against the middle, placing the dairy farmer and the independent producer in a sad way when it comes to the support of dairying.

Did you know that the largest producers of oleomargarine in the country are also the largest producers of butter? National Dairy, through its Kraft affiliate; Swift & Co., Cudahy Packing Co., Wilson & Co., and many others, are active supporters of butter and dairy associations and, at the same time, are providing thousands and thousands of dollars for the promotion and sale of oleomargarine. These large members of the butter and dairy associations provide, through their contributions, a considerable control of the activities of those associations; they can, if they wish, prevent an amalgamation which will produce the most effective ammunition for the butter interests in a fight against repeal of oleo taxes.

The butter people have agreed to the repeal of oleo taxes, providing the Congress secures for butter its traditional markings and the use of the yellow color. Nine months of the year, here in North Dakota, butter contains natural carotin, which provides the yellow color. Three months of the year butter has lighter shades, sometimes being almost white. This is due to the fact that cattle are on dry feed, which produces little color. In other parts of the country—the South and the West particularly—where green feed is available the year 'round, butter has a year-round yellow color.

Why should oleo insist on adopting yellow as a color, except for the purpose of making it look like butter? The Pure Food and Drug Department allows them to add diacetyl and to churn oleo in skimmilk so that it may taste like butter, they allow them to add many units of vitamin A and D so it may have some of the vitamin properties of butter. If oleo is as good as butter and if the consuming public want oleo in preference to butter it can well stand upon its own merits and be sold as a white product; which it is after bleaching, or a dirty gray or tan, which it is before bleaching; instead of being marketed yellow so the public cannot tell it from butter.

It is time for the larger interests, who operate both as butter processors and oleo processors, to come in and tell the truth about millions of dollars they have spent to agitate, to the detriment of the dairy producer.

North Dakota dairy farmers have a big stake in this movement because North Dakota produces surplus milk, which must be made into butter if it is to be salable at all, and we must look to our Members in Congress to provide the people in the country with the truth if the dairyman is to be protected.

Yours very truly,
WALTON S. RUSSELL.

THE CUDAHY PACKING CO.,
Chicago, April 20, 1948.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Our company is engaged not only in the business of slaughtering, processing, and selling meat and meat products but also in the production and sale of butter and oleomargarine. We are, in fact, one of the largest manufacturers of margarine in the United States today. Our interest in the controversy over the present oleomargarine laws is therefore not one-sided. We stated in a communication to Congressman Anton J. Johnson, of Illinois, several weeks ago that we are not asking for repeal of any of the present laws relating to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine. In our opinion, looking at the laws from the standpoint of the welfare of all segments of our economy, no change need be made. In order that you may know the reasons for our position we shall set them forth. They are as follows:

1. The present laws are not unfair or unjust.

(a) The dairy farmer is entitled to the protection of these laws. They protect his market for butterfat against unfair competition from an imitation product. Any businessman is entitled to protection against imitation of his manufactured merchandise.

(b) The consumer is not hurt by these laws.

The tax of one-fourth cent per pound on oleomargarine not colored yellow is small. The license fees which must be paid by the retailer, wholesaler, and the manufacturer are also small when passed on to the consumer, as they undoubtedly are. Applying the total of all these taxes to a family that consumes 3 pounds of oleomargarine per week, every week of the year (156 pounds per year), the total amount of taxes does not exceed 40 cents per year, less than 1 cent per week.

By comparison, the cost of adding vitamin A to oleomargarine is more than three times the amount of the tax, and the cost of advertising the leading brands of oleomargarine normally runs from four to seven times the amount of the tax.

There is no reason why oleomargarine cannot be served white, which is its natural manufactured color, but if the consumer desires to color it, modern packaging enables her to do so without waste of time or product.

Nor have the present laws had any detrimental effect on our national diet or nutrition. Our per capita consumption of fats has increased steadily during the past several decades, rising from 39 pounds in 1912 to 51 pounds in 1941. It declined slightly during the war, but since then has been rising again.

When all elements are carefully considered it can be stated with fairness that these margarine laws have helped the consumer rather than hurt him. Among other things, we can thank these laws for placing the oleomargarine industry on its "good behavior," and prompting it to use American produced oils and to improve its product to a point where it approximates the palatability and nutritional equivalency of butter.

(c) The oleomargarine industry has not been hurt by these laws. Over the past several decades sales have been on a gradually ascending curve. If any hurt has come to the oleomargarine industry it has been self-inflicted. During the past several decades the industry has encouraged rather than discouraged the consumer to take the time and trouble to color her oleomargarine yellow. All of the industry's advertisements have encouraged this practice. Had the industry, on the other hand, spent its millions of advertising dollars encouraging the consumer to serve oleomargarine white, she would probably have become accustomed to using it that way today.

Other industries in food, drugs, clothing, and shelter have gotten us to change our living habits without resorting to a complete imitation of competing articles and the oleomargarine industry could and should do the same without imitating the color of butter.

(d) Our general economy would be seriously affected by a change in these laws.

The uncertain benefits that might accrue to cotton and soybean farmers are so insignificant compared with the certain disastrous effects that would be produced for dairymen by reducing the tax on yellow oleomargarine that we should all pause and examine carefully the implications of these laws before tampering with them. In 1946 only two-tenths of 1 percent of farm income was attributable to oleomargarine. On the other hand, farm income from dairy products was over a hundred times farm income from items attributable to oleomargarine. Even if farm income attributable to oleomargarine were doubled or trebled it would be small, less than one percent. Even for farmers who raised only cotton, but 1.45 percent of their cash farm income in 1946 came from cottonseed oil used in oleomargarine. In the 10 leading cotton States income to farmers from dairy products was 27 times as great as income from oleomargarine in the same year.

Farmers in certain States now raise soybeans. Taking this segment of the farming industry alone, but 5 percent of the income they enjoyed from soybeans came from oleomargarine in 1946.

To sum up, actually oleomargarine is not an important outlet for any farm product.

The following is an interesting extract from the booklet entitled "Oleomargarine and the Farmer" recently published by the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation:

"During 1946 American consumers spent over $2,000,000,000 for the primary edible fats—butter, lard, vegetable shortening, and oleomargarine. Out of this $2,000,000,000 of consumers' money the American farmer received over 60 percent or $1,231,747,000, which was divided as follows:

	Cash farm income in 1946
Butter	$638,011,000
Lard	429,647,000
Vegetable shortening	124,712,000
Oleomargarine	39,377,000
Total	1,231,747,000

"Historical facts prove beyond a doubt that the quantity or poundage of fats used by the average American consumer stays about the same from year to year. Fluctuation occurs in the per capita consumption of the individual fats but an increase in the consumption of one fat generally results in an offsetting decline in another."

Twenty-five percent of our dairy farmers depend largely upon the sale of cream for butter manufacture to maintain their dairy cows. If the oleomargarine laws were repealed over a million of this type of farmer would, in our opinion, be forced to sell most of his cows. The permanent reduction in this segment of our cattle population would affect not only our supply of milk and cream but also our supply of meat.

Inasmuch as butter traditionally has served as the outlet for all surplus supplies of milk after all other milk products (including bottled milk, ice cream, evaporated milk, dried milk, and cheese) have been supplied with their requirements, it is quite apparent that any action adversely affecting butter could create chaotic conditions in the supply and cost to the consumer of all other dairy products. It might well be that in the event that the price of butter were unduly depressed, bringing about substantially reduced production of milk in the over-all in this country, the price of bottled milk and all manufactured dairy products would at times be increased substantially to the consumer.

2. Butter alone is entitled to the yellow color because it alone is always naturally yellow—in varying shades thereof. It is morally entitled to make the claim: "Yellow is the 'trade mark' of butter." Oleomargarine, on the other hand, if processed from vegetable oils from American farms (as it is largely today) cannot be made a natural yellow. These oils are bleached, not because of the Federal laws, not because it is necessary to remove undesirable colors. There has been a great deal of misinformation and misleading propaganda put out on this subject and the record should be set straight.

3. The present 10-cent tax on the sale of yellow oleomargarine reduces the incentive for fraud and assists the Federal authorities in detecting the presence of any considerable quantities that might be palmed off as butter. The monetary incentive to sell yellow oleomargarine at the price of and in the guise of butter is unique in our economy. No other kind of product affords a parallel for comparison. With the quantities of butter sold being so huge and the price spread between butter and oleomargarine so wide, the incentive for fraud is unparalleled. Fraud would undoubtedly be practiced if the present laws were repealed. The frauds which existed when the sale of oleomargarine in this country was unregulated domonstrate this. Oleomargarine being more palatable and nutritious today, deception would be easier.

We should like to make clear at this point that in our opinion the regulatory tax on the retailer is scarcely necessary to effect proper regulation. It could well be removed.

4. Wherever large and healthy farm economies are in existence throughout the world, oleomargarine is under some form of government restriction and regulation. This is true of practically all of the countries of western Europe. In Canada its threat to a healthy economy is considered so serious that the sale of oleomargarine is completely prohibited. It is only during periods of high prices like the present that Canada ever seriously considers modification of its extreme position on oleomargarine.

5. It has been claimed that present oleomargarine laws are a misuse of the Federal taxing power. Actually, only by levying Federal taxes can the Federal Government effectively watch the sale of oleomargarine. The pure food and drug laws are helpless in this regard because they have no jurisdiction over intrastate traffic. However, the Revenue Department can and does enforce the present laws.

We hope that you will study the considerations involved in this butter-oleomargarine controversy and that your decision will not be based upon the exigencies or pressures of the moment, which are transitory.

Sincerely,

F. W. HOFFMAN,
President, Cudahy Packing Co.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly we are going to send this bill to conference. When this was first adopted on the floor of the House, I surprised some of you folks by showing you that you could make it in a triangular form just as easy as you could into a rectangle. I know that some of you doubted that, but it is true. There are absolutely no fears or suspicions on your part that cannot be dispelled if you think this through.

So the chairman or the gentleman promoting this measure accepted my amendment. We passed it and sent it to the other body. That change was accepted, but they went further and said that the four divisions of a pound of oleo in rectangular form containing a pound should be made into four triangle divisions. That is no trouble at all and it will not take any 2 or 3 years to prepare new machinery to prepare oleo in this shape. You can make it triangular form right now in the manufacturing plants by arranging proper cutting equipment.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I was going to point that out. The gentleman mentioned Mr. Truitt, the head of the Oleomargarine Institute, who says that it will take 3 to 5 years to perfect the machinery to make oleo in triangular form. As a matter of fact, all they would have to do is to set a wire to cut it and they could do that in a couple of days.

Mr. HILL. It is the most foolish argument in the world to say they cannot do it. It will wrap up just as easily on a machine when it is a triangle form as it will when it is square.

The only reason they do not want to do this is because they want to sell oleo in cafes and restaurants as butter. This, Mr. Speaker, I am certain we do not wish to accomplish by or through this legislation.

We should insist that our conferees accept the triangular amendment as now written into the bill by the Senate.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I understand it will take only a year to make the hydrogen bomb, so I do not think it will take 3 years to make some machinery to cut this oleomargarine into triangles.

Mr. HILL. Of course it would not take 3 years. It would not take 30 days.

So I hope our conferees will insist on the Senate amendment that provides the triangular shape at the manufacturer's level.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL] has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce to the House that if we dispose of this rule today and dispose of the bill that was supposed to come up on Tuesday from the Committee on the Judiciary, and the next bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, which ought to be done, the other bill relating to bankruptcy would go over until next week, and I would be in a position where I could ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn today we adjourn to meet on Monday next.

I thought the membership of the House might be interested to know what was in my mind and what I hoped for.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN].

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I realize it may be rather futile to oppose the rule at the present time under the prevailing circumstances. However, I think the day will come when the Congress will rue the action it is taking, in helping to demoralize and liquidate our great dairy industry.

In that connection, I think it is worthy of note and of special interest to the Representatives of the State of New York in the Congress that only on yesterday the committee on agriculture of one house of the New York General Assembly reported unfavorably on a bill which would have removed the tax on oleomargarine in the State of New York. So, fortunately for the dairy industry, there are still some State laws prevailing which will protect the great dairy industry. Some day the Congress of the United States may awaken to the fact that it is doing great injury to the dairy farmers of America.

I do hope that when the conference committee takes up the oleo tax repeal bill, the conferees on the part of the House will insist that the amendment requiring the sale of oleomargarine in triangular designs be retained in the bill. This will afford the only protection that the dairy industry will have in its competitive fight with the great oleomargarine monopoly.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEVEN. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does not the gentleman feel that the administration has a right to be proud of their victory which will result in putting the former meager earnings of 2,500,000 of the dairy farmers into the hands of 28 oleomargarine corporations?

Mr. HOEVEN. I do not know what position the administration is going to be in, first posing as the friend of the dairy farmers and then giving them this bitter medicine. I think the farmers of the Midwest at least have gotten to the point where they are going to stop, look, and listen.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN] has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'TOOLE].

Mr. O'TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa, in explaining the action of the New York State Legislature on oleomargarine is that, due to gerrymandering on the part of the Republican Party, the rural areas have far more representation in the State legislature than their population entitles them to. The city population in the State of New York outnumbers the rural population by several million people, but in the legislature the rural areas outvoted the urban groups by reason of the connivance heretofore mentioned.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WIER].

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, at least this delay yesterday afforded an opportunity for some of us, who do not believe anything is futile, to raise our voice again in protest against this legislation, in spite of the fact that this will no doubt go to conference.

I rise today because of the tremendous interest that I have not only in my own district and State but also in the great States abutting Minnesota. I spoke at length on this legislation not as coming from a dairy farm or dairy organization, but as a member of labor, because there are thousands and thousands of men and women in this Nation making a livelihood in the dairy industry; as a matter of fact, I might say there are 25 employed in the dairy industry to every one employed in the oleomargarine industry.

I wish to make this further comment, I listened to the discussion, the plea, and the argument advanced by those from the cotton States. Even though I come from a dairy district, as I listened to the argument, justified as it was in behalf of that great agricultural product so important in their economy, I recognized the factors involved. Fortunately, a sympathetic Congress knowing the problem and knowing that the economy of the South depended to a great degree upon the welfare of the cotton grower, passed helpful legislation. Those of us who come from the northern tier of States to the east and to the west have exactly the same concern with the dairy industry and see the need for some such resolution for that industry. I draw the analogy still closer: With the passage of this legislation we will face exactly the same chaotic condition that the cotton farmers of the South would have faced had they not been granted a revision of the cotton quotas, because in my State while we have prospered in the lumber industry, it has been exploited; while we have prospered in the flour industry, it has now gone to Buffalo. We now depend in our State, Wisconsin, and in adjoining States to a great degree, upon dairying. Dairying is the heart, the economic basis, of the stability of my section of the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, I had not anticipated taking any of the time of this committee, because I felt sure that the membership would go along and grant a rule on this bill about which there is some disagreement, send it to conference, and let us try to work out and bring back to the House a bill that is acceptable to both bodies.

There has been no public statement, but there have been some private suggestions that since it happens that the gentleman from Texas has gone into the dairy business himself in the last 6 months that I have changed my feelings about this margarine legislation. It happens that I have recently invested in a grade A dairy barn and some Jersey cows and hope to very shortly be in a position to help increase the Nation's supply of pure fluid milk, but this has not made me any less interested in doing justice to margarine. I have always felt and still feel that the American consumer was entitled to buy any wholesome food in any form that he wanted to buy it; that the housewife, and not some butter manufacturer, should decide exactly the form, the color, and the shape of margarine; that the housewife should have the opportunity to buy any food that she wants to as long as it is a pure, healthful food. I believe margarine to be that kind of helpful, pure, healthful food, and I think there is no reason that any industry, whether it is my industry, your industry, or that of somebody else, should be given a legislative monopoly to the exclusion of some other healthful and useful food. In the United States let us have actual freedom of enterprise; let us not use the power of the Federal Government to establish a monopoly for any group, or to deny to any other group the right to decide without bureaucratic interference just what people may buy with their own money.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS].

Mr. HAYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Membership of the House has made up its mind to send this piece of legislation to conference.

I have no objection to tax-free competition of products in the United States, but I would be remiss in my duty, not only to my constituents, but to my country, if I did not call the attention of the Congress to the fact that in passing this so-called oleo bill they are placing in jeopardy a great and fundamental industry, and vitally affecting soil conservation in the United States.

Everyone knows that animal husbandry is the basis of good soil conservation. Oleo is made from products which are soil depleting. This Congress on one hand is subsidizing certain farm products, including cotton and cottonseed, and on the other hand laying out money for soil conservation. It is a case of its left hand not knowing what its right hand is doing.

If the dairy industry were subsidized, as is cotton, tobacco, peanuts, and other soil-depleting crops, proponents of this legislation might have a point against butter. In view of the circumstances, however, it seems to me that this Congress is prostituting itself to a money-mad monopoly of 28 oleo manufacturers, and I predict that the consumer in the long run will have no savings as a result of this bill, because this monopolistic group will immediately raise the price of their inferior product and gouge the public that much more.

The least that this House can do is to instruct the conferees to make sure that oleo in restaurants should be served in triangular shapes, so the customer will know whether or not he is getting butter.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following Members as conferees on the part of the House: Messrs. COOLEY, PACE, POAGE, HOPE, and AUGUST H. ANDRESEN.

EXPEDITIOUS NATURALIZATION OF FORMER CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 437 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6616) to provide for the expeditious naturalization of former citizens of the United States who have lost United States citizenship through voting in a political election or in a plebiscite held in Italy. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and at this time yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order consideration of the bill (H. R. 6616) to provide for the expeditious naturalization of former citizens of the United States who have lost United States citizenship through voting in a political election or in a plebiscite held in Italy.

Most of the Members will recall that prior to the plebiscite in Italy we in this country through the press and through radio broadcasts asked all people of Italian extraction to write to their friends and relatives in Italy urging them to take part in the Italian election. As a result of this many of them did take part in the election and lost their American citizenship.

This bill seeks to restore their former citizenship, whether it was by birth or naturalization. It will not affect the immigration laws because it limits the number to those people who were formerly citizens.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. The same situation has obtained to the same degree in connection with other countries where plebiscites have been held, as in Germany, Japan, and elsewhere, where previously the countries had been enemies of the United States before the war or during the war. Why is the bill limited specifically to Italy?

Mr. DELANEY. I think the chairman of the committee will be able to answer all of your questions on that point. Hearings were held and I understand that after considerable hearings this bill was reported almost unanimously.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Is it not a fact this bill will take care of those people who were only visiting at the time of these elections and were urged by persuasion or influence to vote with the idea of defeating the Communist forces of the country?

Mr. DELANEY. The gentleman is correct; only those people who were visiting and who are now in Italy and unable to return to this country.

Mr. TAURIELLO. They did not realize that they would lose their citizenship by voting in those elections; is that right?

Mr. DELANEY. That is right. We urged them to vote, but we did not say at that time that if they voted, they would lose their citizenship.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Is it not true that some of the people who lost their citizenship were people who owned property in the several States of the United States, and by losing their citizenship they are placed on a different taxing basis, and it works a great injustice to them?

Mr. DELANEY. The gentleman is correct. It also results in breaking up these families where one part of the family was in the United States and the other part visiting in Italy.

In calling up this bill today I am doing so in the hope of expediting the return to the United States of some three to four thousand Americans who lost their citizenship as a result of their devotion to democracy. These Americans were visiting in Italy in June 1946, or in April 1948, at which times critical elections were being held in Italy. Caught up in the heated struggle between the pro-Communist and pro-democratic forces in Italy, the visitors to Italy found themselves subjected to a combination of pressures which led them to believe their duty was to cast a vote in the elections.

The elections were thus not ordinary polls such as are held normally in most free countries every year; the elections in question were unique in more than one respect. Their singularity is such as to warrant an exception to our nationality laws—there is no likelihood of a repetition of the circumstances which occasioned the introduction of this bill.

The two elections in question were, first, the plebiscite in which Italians were called upon to cast a vote for or against the restoration of the monarchy. A vote against the monarchy was commonly regarded in Italy as a vote in favor of closer links with the western democracies.

The second poll was a national election, held in April 1948, for the purpose of seating members of the Chamber of Deputies. This was a hotly contested struggle in which the Communist Party and its collaborators pitted their strength against the prodemocratic political groups. A vote for the prodemocratic candidates was naturally regarded in Italy as a vote to bring Italy definitely and effectively within the coalition of western democracies.

In both cases the ballot cast by the individual Italian was weighed with consequences not only for his nation, but for the future of Europe and the peace of the world. The responsibility was a heavy one.

It was emphasized by three kinds of pressure, exerted on all Italians in an effort to bring all voters to the polls.

The first of these pressures was a legal one: the Italian election law compels all citizens to vote under penalty of certain civic disabilities. Second was the moral pressure, imposed by friends and neighbors, to make it clear that nonvoters would be singled out in their communities as civic slackers. Third was the unlawful pressure imposed by Communist Party supporters, who used threats and coercion to force Italians to the polls, in the hope of gaining votes for the Communist candidates.

There was, finally, the pressure of public opinion in the United States, expressed by the urgent appeals of columnists and radio commentators, whose efforts set in motion a great letter-writing campaign by Americans who had relatives in Italy. This campaign loosed a flood of a million personal letters to Italians from their American relatives or friends.

Influenced by all these factors, some three to four thousand Americans in Italy at the time of the elections went to the polls intending to aid democracy. Their good intentions brought them under the penalties of the Nationalty Act, and it is to save them from these penalties—loss of citizenship—that this bill was introduced.

Besides righting a wrong, passage of this bill will silence the Italian Communists who never tire of jeering at the Americans who voted for the sake of democracy, and now find themselves penalized because of their love for democracy.

Unless we lift this severe penalty, many families will be broken up, wives separated from their husbands, children from their parents. Americans who went to Italy simply to make a brief visit now find themselves unable to return to the United States, to their homes, to their businesses.

I think it should be clearly understood that this bill does not open a gap in our immigration laws. This measure will not start any flood of unrestricted immigration. On the contrary, the bill simply makes a fair and humane exception for some three to four thousand Americans whose concern for democracy brought on them an unexpected and extremely harsh penalty.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Speaker, I have not learned of anyone who is opposed to this resolution; therefore I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 323 of the act of October 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 1149), entitled "An act to revise and codify the nationality laws of the United States into a comprehensive nationality code," as heretofore amended, is hereby further amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"A person who, while a citizen of the United States, has lost citizenship of the United States solely by reason of having voted in a political election or plebiscite held in Italy after October 13, 1943, and before January 1, 1949, and who has not committed any other act enumerated in chapter IV of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended, may be naturalized by taking, prior to 3 years from the enactment of this act before any naturalization court specified in subsection (a) of section 301, or before any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States abroad, the oaths prescribed by section 335. Certified copies of such oaths shall be sent by such diplomatic or consular officer or such court to the Department of State and to the Department of Justice. Such persons shall have, from and after naturalization under this section, the same citizenship status as that which existed immediately prior to its loss. The illegal or fraudulent procurement of naturalization under this amendment shall be subject to cancellation in the same manner as provided in section 338."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, for the past several years a large number of private bills have been introduced for the relief of those people who lost their American citizenship because they voted in the Italian elections. After the Committee on the Judiciary had considered a number of these bills, it was determined to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the situation indicated the need for over-all general legislation.

The committee conducted rather extensive hearings on this question, and last summer, when the special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary made its investigation of several problems in Europe, it devoted about 8 days to an investigation of this particular situation in Italy. It has been determined that approximately 3,000 Americans, native-born Americans, if you please, lost their citizenship because they voted in the elections held in 1946 and in 1948, when the fight against communism was the issue.

Many hardships have resulted therefrom. These people have no way of returning to the United States except as quota immigrants, and with the Italian quota oversubscribed for upwards of 8 years, you can readily see how long it is going to take for most of these people to return to the country in which they were born. Significantly enough, between the end of the war and the time when the Italian Government ceased to require a visa to an American passport, nearly 89,000 Americans visited in Italy. Many of these people voted in these elections. Under the Nationality Act of 1940, section 401 (e), the mere fact that they voted, automatically deprived them of their American citizenship.

In Rome I met a man who comes from the Middle West. His father and his grandfather before him were born in the United States. He was visiting in Italy just before the war and was caught by the war and was unable to return to the United States.

When the drive started in 1946 to try to defeat the Communists, this man participated quite actively in that campaign. It was with a great deal of pride that he presented himself to the American consul in an attempt to obtain the necessary credentials in order to get back to the United States, and he announced that he not only had voted in the election but also campaigned very actively in that election. By doing so that man closed the doors on his returning to this middle western town in which he was born and where he was in business for a great many years.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McSWEENEY. I was in Italy 3 years in the Army and as director of welfare under the administration of American relief for Italy. I participated in urging these people to vote. I am party to the thing that caused their difficulty. May I say to the gentleman also that nobody in America probably will realize the tremendous struggle the Italian made, with all his poverty, to resist the tempting things the Communists were offering him at that time.

Mr. WALTER. There is no question about it. In addition to the very active part the American and the British armed forces played in these campaigns, there was the sort of pressure brought to bear on these people that just could not be resisted. For example, the names of the people who did not vote were posted in city halls. It was announced in public places that unless people voted they would be deprived of all government services, which of course meant ration coupons, and it meant that the Italian Government would not entertain any of their requests to have their papers put in shape so that they could return to the United States.

The tragic part of this whole situation comes from the fact that over 80 percent of the people affected were born in the United States. Under the law, if the person returns to the country of his nativity after he has been naturalized and remains there for 2 years, he loses his citizenship for that reason. This measure is therefore for the benefit almost entirely of native-born American citizens.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I have a constituent, who under very similar circumstances, and without anything remotely approaching moral turpitude, voted in an election held in Germany under the auspices of the American military government. I have introduced a bill which would relieve her of the penalties. It certainly seems to me that people who did the same thing in Germany that these people here contemplated did in Italy should be similarly relieved. Would the gentleman object to that?

Mr. WALTER. Not in the least, except that I do not believe an amendment should be placed on this measure. Our committee is aware of a small number of similar cases in countries other than Italy. Just recently the House approved a measure for the benefit of an American lady 83 years old who was visiting in England. She voted in one of the by-elections for a member of Parliament and, by so doing, lost her citizenship. I do not believe we ought to attempt in this measure to meet the situation the gentleman has described, because there cannot be many people involved. In this particular case, as I said, there are over 3,000.

But I do believe in those other elections, those cases should be dealt with as individual private bills in order that a complete inquiry can be made as to the activities of the person for whom relief is sought.

Mr. HALE. Is it not a fact that in the vast majority of cases of people who vote in foreign elections, they do so in good faith without any appreciation or knowledge of the penalty to which they may be subjected?

Mr. WALTER. I do not think there is any question about that. The gentleman might be interested in the background of section 401 (e) of the Nationality Act of 1940. It was passed because large numbers of Americans of German descent were going to Germany in order to vote in the plebiscite on the Saar and we felt that by going over there to aid Mr. Hitler in taking over this territory those people should lose their citizenship. I do not suppose anybody could foresee at that time when just the opposite situation would prevail.

Mr. HALE. I will not offer any amendment to this bill if the gentleman can assure me that the position of people like my constituent who voted in some German election is receiving the active study of his committee and that his committee intends to report some legislation.

Mr. WALTER. Yes; I give the gentleman that assurance and if general legislation is not recommended for that particular type of case, then I assure the gentleman that if he makes out a proper case we will be very glad to report out a private bill because it is no different from other private bills of the same sort which have already been enacted into law.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the gentleman has brought out a very meritorious bill. I have a constituent who happens to be of Japanese blood, born in the United States. He was in Japan at the time the war broke out. He meticulously refrained from performing any act which might void his citizenship in the United States. However, under similar circumstances to those when the United States military was calling for plebiscites and elections and all sorts of things he was persuaded, because he knew something about elections, if you please, to enter the scene and he did cast a vote, and is therefore refused reentry into the United States.

Mr. WALTER. If he was born in the United States and the only act committed which would deprive him of his citizenship was the mere voting, I am quite certain that the Committee on the Judiciary will be perfectly willing to grant that particular individual relief which he seeks.

Mr. HINSHAW. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. SADLAK. Is it not a fact that there would be no necessity for this legislation according to our nationality laws if these people who are citizens of the United States would not have performed this overt act of voting because of which they are being excluded?

Mr. WALTER. Yes; that is it, exactly.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Would this bill correct in any way the loss of citizenship which arose for any reason other than voting in one of these plebiscites as for example a combination of things such as having voted and at the same time earlier having joined the Italian Army to fight against the United States?

Mr. WALTER. It would not. This applies just to the mere fact of voting and nothing else, because there are many instances where people not only voted, but before that time had taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign power.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 6616 refers to former United States citizens who voted in the Italian elections in 1946 and 1948, who, by their participation in either or both elections, forfeited their United States citizenship. Our subcommittee, under our chairman, the very able Member from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], investigated thoroughly the situation obtaining in Italy during the time of these elections.

It is understood that besides setting forth the right of qualified Italians to vote, the laws also state that each Italian should vote.

In the 1946 elections in Italy, pressure was brought by various interested groups, notably those of the left—partisans—to induce people to go to the polls. Such pressure was entirely outside of any legal or constitutional basis, and might be compared with organized campaigns such as have existed and will probably continue to exist in the United States, by political parties or certain organizations representing vested interests. In some instances, particularly in small communities where the identity of each individual is known, such pressure undoubtedly was effective. However, no legal sanctions could be threatened or enforced. Threats were made to do bodily harm, to fire nonvoters, or to take away their food-ration coupons. No instances are known where any such sanctions were ever carried out.

In the election of April 18, 1948, with the high stakes involved in the election, pressure was brought from both sides, that is, from the Communists and their sympathizers and from those who were interested in a democratic form of government. The campaigns originating in the United States played an important part. The Italian Government, which also was vitally interested in the outcome of the elections, is understood to have sponsored posters which appeared shortly before the election, stating that lists would be made of those persons who did not exercise their franchise, and that the failure to vote would then be inscribed in the person's good-conduct file. Again, in smaller communities, word was spread that food-ration cards might be withdrawn, that living quarters might be taken away, and that persons might lose their jobs if they did not vote. Such notices, though entirely illegal and not enforceable except by abuse of power, unquestionably were effective in the smaller communities.

The threats made undoubtedly placed many persons in a position of great embarrassment, even though they might not be classed in the category of threats to life and limb.

It is interesting to note that no cases have come to light where threats were carried out. No instances are known where entries were made in a person's good-conduct record, where ration cards were withdrawn, or where positions were lost as a consequence of nonvoting.

Dual citizens, that is, persons with both United States and Italian nationality, were faced at election time with the choice of voting, thereby ensuring their continued well-being in Italy, or not voting and thereby possibly incurring some unhappiness by manifesting loyalty to the United States.

Unquestionably many dual citizens voted because they felt it their duty to oppose the communistic ideology and to assist in the establishment of true democracy.

Recognizing the tremendous pressure that was exerted by the United States through its State Department and Members of Congress direct to Italian people in Italy, as well as the campaigns by newspapers in the United States requesting citizens here to write to their relatives in Italy to urge them to vote against the Communist Party in these elections, I feel that we should restore United States citizenship to these former dual citizens. It is my earnest belief that H. R. 6616 is a meritorious bill and I urge its passage.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is a meritorious and much-needed piece of legislation. On the same day that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the committee, introduced this bill, I introduced a companion measure, H. R. 6617, which reads the same way.

These elections of 1948 in Italy were among the most important which were ever held in the world at any time. The issue was whether Italy would remain free or go Communist. That was of vital concern to the free peoples of the world everywhere. That the anti-Communist forces in Italy should prevail in this election was a matter of supreme importance to liberty lovers the world over.

For weeks before this election, over the air waves friends and relatives in this country were urging the Italians to vote in the election. I, as did the gentleman from Ohio, happen to have participated, albeit unwittingly, in bringing this about, because of having broadcast over the short-wave radio to Italy. Many of these people who were American citizens, then in Italy on business, visiting relatives, or otherwise engaged, took this plea a little too literally and went ahead and voted in this election. Of course, they did not have a right to do it. But neither did they think they were doing anything wrong.

Then, when they tried to come back to this country, they found to their chagrin and regret that they were denied the right to return to their native shores. It has broken up homes. It has caused all kinds of hardship among the people of this country.

The enactment of this bill will result in restoring to one roof many American families who were disrupted by this innocent, though mistaken, effort to advance the ideals and principles of freedom to which all of us in this body subscribe.

I hope this measure will be enacted.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Why does the measure go back to 1943?

Mr. KEATING. The elections in which these people voted were mostly held in 1946 and 1948. The chairman may be able to explain the reason for going back to 1943.

Mr. WALTER. If the gentleman will yield, that date is when Italy ceased to be an enemy and became a cobelligerent.

Mr. KEATING. As a practical matter, I believe that 1946 was the first election in which anyone did vote.

Mr. GROSS. How is this list compiled? Are you basing it upon the voting records in Italy, or what?

Mr. KEATING. It is based upon the records of those in Italy who actually voted in the elections, who were American citizens, and who improperly did so. Then, when they tried to come back here, that voting record prevented them from returning to this country.

Mr. GROSS. Is it possible that we are bringing back citizens who may have borne arms against the United States?

Mr. KEATING. As to bearing arms, that is covered by another entirely unrelated section of the law. It is not affected in any way by the legislation before us today.

That is not covered in the terms of this law. Any prohibition against restoration of citizenship on that ground would be completely unaffected by anything we do here today on this bill.

Mr. GROSS. Almost anyone could say they bore arms under duress in Italy, could they not, in 1943 and 1944?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] has expired.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, there are today in Italy native-born and naturalized Americans who no longer enjoy the privileges of American citizenship by virtue of the fact that several thousand of them had participated in the elections held in Italy since 1943.

It should not be difficult for us to recall that at the time of such subsequent elections, the United States and all freedom-loving peoples throughout the world had focused their attention on Italy primarily because the elections there were a contest of paramount importance determining whether the advancing tide of communism was to be checked or permitted to run rampant. The people of the United States were vitally interested in the outcome and accordingly took steps to do something about it. Messages through the medium of the radio, the cable, and the thousands upon thousands of letters were directed to the Italians urging that their ballots be cast in opposition to the growing menace that even now is ruthlessly attempting to spread its doctrine and dictatorial power to every corner of the earth.

The intensive campaign waged before the election gathered such force and momentum that it swept in the several thousand Americans who were then in Italy. It goes without saying that the presence of these Americans in Italy during so crucial a time constituted a service to the cause of freedom that can scarcely be measured. These Americans in their fervent desire to assist went all out and voted along with the Italians. This spontaneous act was prompted by their first-hand knowledge and experience with freedom here in the United States. It was perfectly natural for them to feel that they were doing the right thing for the embattled Italians opposing the Communists and, incidentally, for the United States, with the hope that the same undesirable situation might not be visited upon the Nation of which they were citizens. The discovery that they faced the loss of United States citizenship because of having voted in the Italian election came as a crushing shock when they were ready to return to the United States.

It is strangely ironical that the very act which was to help the Italians and the opponents of communism should in turn prove to be the means by which these unfortunate people would be denied the right to regain their status as Americans.

To rectify this unhappy situation, because a number of such cases affecting former Connecticut citizens had been called to my attention, I introduced a like bill, namely, H. R. 6781, providing for this same desirable relief to former citizens of the United States who have lost United States citizenship through voting in a political election or in a plebiscite held in Italy. For no other reason than the overt act of voting in either or both of these elections, knowingly or unknowingly of the consequences, did these persons in the eyes of our immigration and naturalization laws forfeit their United States citizenship and expatriate themselves.

At present these expatriates cannot return to the United States. They face the unpleasant and long wait as immigrants, subject to a quota that is heavily oversubscribed for a number of years ahead.

I commend the chairman of the subcommittee whose bill we are discussing and congratulate the expeditious handling of this important legislation. I shall vote for this bill and urge its passage now in order that the return to our shores of these former citizens of the United States may be hastened and families reunited.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support H. R. 6616 and I trust it will be speedily enacted into law. A number of cases of American citizens who lost their cherished citizenship by having participated in the Italian elections in 1946 or 1948 have come to my attention, and I can personally testify as to the considerable hardship that has resulted for them, in addition to the loss of citizenship. It was believed that a heavy vote would assure the defeat of the Communists in these vital elections when the struggle between totalitarian and democratic forces in Italy was at its height, and strong pressure was brought to bear upon persons living in Italy to participate. The campaign was conducted both in Italy and the United States, and over a million individual letters were sent from this country to Italian residents. This combination of domestic and external pressures resulted in the highest percentage of votes ever cast in a democratic election, the Italian election of April 1948 which was the decisive factor in saving the country from communism. It is easy to understand how under the conditions that existed at the time these American citizens were prevailed upon to vote, not realizing that they would thereby expatriate themselves. They are now barred from returning to the United States and are separated from their families in this country. Parents are separated from their children; husbands from their wives; persons who were in Italy on short visits or on business are unable to return to their homes and places of business in this country. As the committee report points out, the unhappy fate of these former American citizens is being used for propaganda purposes by the Communists who lose no occasion to stress the irony of the position in which they have placed themselves by having supported the democratic forces in Italy. There is real necessity for providing for a solution of the problem, and I urge the passage of this bill to restore United States citizenship to these persons.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 6616 affords a unique opportunity to the Congress to alleviate the harsh results of a good law, the application of which to a specific situation has produced unforeseen results. I refer to the application of section 401 (e) of the Nationality Act of 1940 to the activities of American citizens who partcipated in a political election or plebiscite held in Italy after October 13, 1943.

The purpose of this bill is to restore United States citizenship, whether acquired by birth or naturalization, to persons who lost it solely through the operation of section 401 (e) by voting in Italy after that nation became a cobelligerent with the United States in 1943. The problem has been the subject of intensive study by a special subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary. In addition to careful consideration in this country, the special committee went to Italy to study the situation first-hand. Following the completion of its work the subcommittee issued a carefully considered House Report No. 1469 which I recommend to all Members for their consideration. The report points out that in the 1946 election and plebiscite strong pressure was brought upon voters by left-wing parties. To counteract this pressure influential American columnists and radio commentators prompted American citizens of Italian descent to induce their relatives to vote, and an intensive letter-writing campaign produced over a million individual letters, according to reliable estimates, from the United States to Italian voters. I can attest to the fact that this type of campaign had remarkable results for democracy. In some small measure I contributed to this result for I was one of the organizers of a letter-writing brigade, called the Good-Will Brigade which was made up of some 400 ex-GI's who volunteered their services in this effort. We used every possible avenue afforded us to urge the people in Italy to vote in order to save democracy in Italy. And they responded. No one will deny that the 1948 Italian election constituted an important factor in the ideological struggle between the totalitarian East and the democratic West. The special subcommittee came to the conclusion that this heavy vote could be attributed both to the political contingency during which Italy resumed, after almost 25 years, the exercise of the democratic rights of her people, and to the half-compulsory nature of the Italian election law.

Now, I do not wish to stress this factor of compulsion. However, in all fairness, you should be reminded that good standing, which was essential to the enjoyment of certain privileges and benefits, required the exercise of the franchise in the Italian election. Another factor which must be considered is that dual citizenship exists in Italy. There is no provision in the Italian law that Italian citizens or their children who have lost their nationality by becoming naturalized in a foreign country automatically lose their Italian citizenship. According to the report, there is, moreover, no provision in the Italian statutes under which expatriated Italians must give notification of their change-of-citizenship status to the Italian Government, and, therefore, their names continue to appear on the list of voters.

In examining this problem, the two departments of the Government having jurisdiction over this matter—the Departments of State and Justice—have found that the obligation to vote, as established by the Italian law, cannot in itself be considered as actual compulsion and that, therefore, coercion and duress could not be invoked by the parties concerned as sufficient reason to present the operation of section 401 (e) against their interests. The Department of State, accordingly, has refused consistently the the granting of American passports to these native-born or naturalized American citizens who have voted in either the Italian election or plebiscite, holding uniformly that the applicants have expatriated themselves under the terms of the law. Technically their position is correct and is similar to that taken by the courts generally, for it is a well-settled presumption that each person knows the law.

This principle of law gives rise to difficulties. If it were once allowed, for example, in answer to any complaint of violation of the law to set up the defense of ignorance, then there must necessarily be gradations of ignorance and gradations of default, and a preliminary inquiry in each case as to whether such ignorance was real or assumed, culpable or innocent. One would be entitled to urge that he had never received any education at all; another, that he was about to study the law, but had not yet advanced sufficiently in his studies; a third, that he had made an effort to learn, but could find no sufficient teachers; a fourth, that he had to earn a living, or had no sufficient means, and so had no leisure to study; a fifth, that he had applied to the wisest person in his area, and had been misled by the information he had received; and a sixth, that he had made careful inquiry, and found the highest authorities equally wise and weighty on both sides, and was unable to decide which should be his guide. It might be asked, if such inquiries were permitted, what materials exist to enable any court or administrative agency satisfactorily to dispose of them. The interior of a man's mind is beyond the reach of inquiry. Courts and administrative agencies wisely abandon the impossible task, and treat all as incompetent to set up any such defense of ignorance of the law, leaving each to find out for himself, and in his own way, whatever he wants, and to take the risk of his want of knowledge.

Many of these citizens voted without knowledge of section 401 and the forfeiture that it would work. Congress, however, is not bound by this presumption that each person knows the law, and by amendatory legislation it can remove this extreme and harsh result which was unforeseen by many, if not most, of the citizens participating in these plebiscites and elections in Italy. I recommend the passage of H. R. 6616 as reported.

Mr. TAURIELLO. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in supporting H. R. 6616, and I sincerely hope it will receive favorable congressional action as quickly as possible.

The Italian elections held in April of 1948 were among the most important in the history of the world. The forces of communism were hard at work in an endeavor to enslave the people of Italy and free peoples everywhere were concerned with the outcome.

For some time before the elections strong pressure was brought to bear upon countless persons living in Italy at the time to participate in the elections in an endeavor to insure the defeat of the evil forces of communism. It was believed that a heavy vote would bring about a democratic victory over the forces of totalitarianism. Therefore a campaign was started both in the United States and in Italy in order to engender enthusiasm for the democratic cause and over 1,000,000 cables and letters bombarded people in Italy, urging them to take part in the elections. Prominent columnists and radio commentators in America, Members of Congress, and other influential American officials took part in radio broadcasts directed to Italian voters, impressing upon them the imperative necessity for casting their ballots.

As the committee report states:

> It is due to the combination of all these moral, legal and political, domestic and external pressures that the Italian election of April 18, 1948, reached what is believed to be the highest percentage of votes ever cast in a democratic election—92 percent.

Approximately 5,000 American citizens, who at the time were in Italy on business or pleasure, had become fired with enthusiasm in an effort to assist the Italian fight for freedom. They cast their ballots, little realizing that in doing so they would expatriate themselves.

When they sought to return to the United States, they were dismayed to learn that they had lost their citizenship.

Many heartbreaking situations ensued thereafter. Parents were separated from their children, husbands from their wives, brothers and sisters from each other. Persons who had gone to Italy for short visits or on business found themselves unable to return home to their native land. I am personally acquainted with many such cases and with the hardships being endured by countless families. It is easy to understand the conditions under which these American citizens were prevailed upon to vote without realizing they would expatriate themselves by doing so.

The House Judiciary Committee has indicated that the plight of these unfortunate people is being used by the Communists for propaganda purposes to stress the irony of the position in which they placed themselves in an effort to support the democratic forces in Italy.

I believe that there is a real need for the passage of legislation which would remove this disability and permit these former American citizens to rejoin their friends and families here at home, provided they have had clean records during the period while they were out of the United States.

Congressional approval of this bill will alleviate much heartbreak and suffering and will restore to one roof many American families disrupted by this innocent, but mistaken, attempt to aid the cause of democracy and freedom.

I strongly recommend the passage of this bill and urge the enthusiastic support of my fellow colleagues in an endeavor to right this injustice.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, on October 12, 1949, I introduced a bill similar to H. R. 6616 to repatriate Americans who voted in Italian elections. To anyone informed, the history of conditions abroad, especially during the war years, gives ample support to this legislation.

Many persons, while citizens of the United States, without realizing the true import of their acts, and acting in all good faith, voted in Italian elections to help turn back the rising tide of communism. But, under the provisions of the Nationality Act of 1940, which became effective on January 13, 1941, they lost their American citizenship for so voting.

The passage of the act at this time had been given little space in the world press because of the emphasis on war news and communication facilities throughout the world were badly disrupted because of military considerations.

Thus it may readily be seen that these people were without notice of the serious consequences of voting in these elections, and it may be inferred that they certainly would not have so quickly given up their rights as citizens of the greatest country in the world, had they known of the passage of the act. Moreover, under the urgings of relatives and friends in the United States and others whom they considered well versed in international affairs they did what they thought was their duty to the Nation and the world.

The House has done well to take positive steps to correct the unjust situation with which these people are faced.

Mr. McGRATH. The passage of H. R. 6616 is merely keeping faith with the people of Italy. During the days when the Red horde of communism threatened to engulf that nation, we pleaded with the people of Italy to vote in their general election. The people responded nobly, and by the force of a free election, defeated communism. Over radio and by mail the people of Italy were urged by many outstanding citizens of New York City, notably the Honorable Generoso Pope, the Honorable Juvenal Marchisio, the Honorable S. Samuel DiFalco, and Mr. Mauro Romita, and thousands of others to vote against communism. Italians of American citizenship who were in Italy at that time responded nobly and cast their vote for the democratic form of government. Unfortunately, because of that act under existing law they were expatriated. Today the voice of America again rings out and by the action of this House accomplishes the first step in restoring their citizenship and does simple justice.

I urge the passage of this bill and trust that the Senate will promptly concur in our action.

THEY ARE AMERICANS

Mr. KLEIN. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy indeed that this bill, which will provide a swift means of repatriation of American citizens who had the misfortune to lose their American citizenship without any such intention, is here before the House with the blessing of the respected Committee on the Judiciary, and under the sponsorship of the distinguished chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER].

I am one of those who believes that our immigration laws are too harsh and too rigid, and I am especially dubious of those expatriation clauses which place a special disability—in my opinion, in defiance of the Constitution—on naturalized citizens, in the Nationality Act of 1940. In conformity with my attitude, I have pending before the House H. R. 1915, which would repeal section 404 and the ensuing paragraphs.

However, the bill now under debate does not relate to these special disabilities, but to those clauses which bear with equal weight on all citizens, and which require an overt act to take away American citizenship.

URGED TO VOTE

One of those overt acts is voting in an election in a foreign country, which is, indubitably, an act of citizenship in any country. The injustice involved here lies only in the context of the act of voting. Eligible voters in several countries of Europe were urged by all our organs of opinion—radio, press, personal letters—to vote for democratic freedom as against an encroaching totalitarianism.

Unfortunately, American citizens in some countries, especially in Italy, took those admonitions very much to heart, and took part in popular elections, not realizing that by that act they were depriving themselves of American citizenship, even though they were American born and bred. Some of these citizens had been caught in Europe by the war, and were unaware of the provisions of the Nationality Act; others simply did not have the education to understand what they were doing.

This was most markedly true in the plebiscite in Italy.

EASY PROCEDURE SET UP

As a result of the barrage of propaganda through every channel, many American citizens, having no intention of renouncing American citizenship, and anxious only to help preserve a democratic government, cast votes in one or more of the Italian elections.

This bill enables such expatriated American citizens to restore their American citizenship by simple processes, either in a naturalization court or before American consular officers.

I am certain that the bill will pass, and I hope that every Member motivated by justice and mercy will support it.

I feel a vicarious pride in this bill, for I have had pending two joint resolutions which would suspend the operation of section 401 (e). One is a bill relating only to those who took part in the Italian plebiscite; the other is broader and would suspend the automatic expatriation of the act against any United States citizen who innocently and without intent of losing citizenship cast a vote in any election in Europe between September 1, 1939, and January 1, 1949.

The pending measure will take care of the most pressing cases which might have been remedied by adoption of either or both of my bills, and I am happy to accept H. R. 6616 in lieu thereof.

SELECTIVE IMMIGRATION

I believe that I do not violate the rule of germaneness if I take this opportunity to speak a good word also for another hopeful measure introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER].

I refer to H. R. 3001, which, we hope, will be taken up following disposition of H. R. 6616.

It is my belief that H. R. 3001 is the most intelligent contribution to our tangled mass of immigration laws in many years. I hope sincerely that it passes without dissent, and that it has an equally auspicious reception in the other House. The bill would introduce to our immigration statutes a principle of selective immigration. Since it is of limited scope in its terms, I cannot say it would replace the present discriminatory system; but it at least proposes a needed reform on which further revision may be based in a happy future.

Mr. BOLTON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply interested in, and actively support, the bill before the House today, which will restore to their American citizenship the 3,000 or more native-born Americans who lost their citizenship because they voted in the elections held in Italy in 1946 and 1948 when the fight against communism was the chief issue.

Many injustices have been done these good people who rendered such valiant service to Italy and, incidentally, to all liberty-loving people in America and throughout the world, because the victory of the Christian Party in Italy was the greatest blow ever dealt communism. Instead of penalizing these patriotic people, I think we should give them a vote of thanks.

These people have no way of returning to the United States except by special act of Congress, unless they come in under the heavily oversubscribed Italian quota, which might involve months or even years of waiting. Besides righting the wrong that has been done them, by the passage of this bill, we will silence the Italian Communists who are continually jeering at these American citizens who voted to help preserve democracy in Italy and who were then penalized for their love of democracy.

During the summer recess of Congress, Congressman WALTER, of Pennsylvania, who sponsored this resolution, met a man in Rome who comes from the Middle West. His father and his grandfather before him were born in the United States. He was visiting in Italy just before the war and was caught by the war and was unable to return to the United States.

When the drive started in 1946 to try to defeat the Communists, this man participated quite actively in that campaign. It was with a great deal of pride that he presented himself to the American consul in an attempt to obtain the necessary credentials in order to get back to the United States, and he announced that he not only had voted in the election but also campaigned very actively in that election. By doing so that man closed the doors on his returning to this middle western town in which he was born and where he was in business for a great many years.

In the election of April 18, 1948, with the high stakes involved in the election, pressure was brought from both sides; that is, from the Communists and their sympathizers and from those who were interested in a democratic form of government. The campaigns originating in the United States played an important part. The Italian Government, which also was vitally interested in the outcome of the elections, is understood to have sponsored posters which appeared shortly before the election, stating that lists would be made of those persons who did not exercise their franchise, and that the failure to vote would then be inscribed in the person's good-conduct file. Again, in smaller communities word was spread that food-ration cards might be withdrawn, that living quarters might be taken away, and that persons might lose their jobs if they did not vote. Such notices, though entirely illegal and not enforceable except by abuse of power, unquestionably were effective in the smaller communities.

The threats made undoubtedly placed many persons in a position of great embarrassment, even though they might not be classed in the category of threats to life and limb.

It is interesting to note that no cases have come to light where threats were carried out. No instances are known where entries were made in a person's good-conduct record, where ration cards were withdrawn, or where positions were lost as a consequence of nonvoting.

Dual citizens, that is, persons with both United States and Italian nationality, were faced at election time with the choice of voting, thereby ensuring their continued well-being in Italy, or not voting and thereby possibly incurring some unhappiness by manifesting loyalty to the United States.

Unquestionably many dual citizens voted because they felt it their duty to oppose the communistic ideology and to assist in the establishment of true democracy.

Recognizing the tremendous pressure that was exerted by the United States through its State Department and Members of Congress direct to Italian people in Italy, as well as the campaigns by newspapers in the United States requesting citizens here to write to their relatives ir Italy to urge them to vote against the Communist Party in these elections, I feel that we should restore United States citizenship to these former dual citizens. It is my earnest belief that H. R. 6616 is a meritorious bill and I urge its passage.

Some of these Americans are, no doubt, the mothers and fathers of children in America. If we had refused to pass the bill, we might have destroyed many homes in the United States. This would indeed be a tragedy because the Italians are a home-loving people, devoted to their families.

I represent a large part of the Italian population in Baltimore City. They are good Americans; they are honest, hard-working people. It is a real pleasure to represent them and I only wish all of our American people were as good citizens as my constituents who were born in Italy. They know how to appreciate the blessings of democracy and they never cease to express their love and devotion to their adopted country.

In order that everyone may know the meaning of the bill which I enthusiastically support, I quote the language of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 323 of the act of October 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 1149), entitled "An act to revise and codify the nationality laws of the United States into a comprehensive nationality code," as heretofore amended, is hereby further amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"A person who, while a citizen of the United States, has lost citizenship of the United States solely by reason of having voted in a political election or plebiscite held in Italy after October 13, 1943, and before January 1, 1949, and who has not committed any other act enumerated in chapter IV of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended, may be naturalized by taking, prior to 3 years from the enactment of this act before any naturalization court specified in subsection (a) of section 301, or before any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States abroad, the oaths prescribed by section 335. Certified copies of such oaths shall be sent by such diplomatic or consular officer or such court to the Department of State and to the Department of Justice. Such persons shall have, from and after naturalization under this section, the same citizenship status as that which existed immediately prior to its loss. The illegal or fraudulent procurement of naturalization under this amendment shall be subject to cancellation in the same manner as provided in section 338."

I will be delighted when the bill is passed by the House and in doing so we will keep faith with the people of Italy.

During the days when the Red horde of communism threatened to engulf that nation, we pleaded with the people of Italy to vote in their general election. The people responded nobly, and by the force of a free election, defeated communism. Over radio and by mail the people of Italy were urged by many outstanding citizens of America to vote against communism. Italians of American citizenship who were in Italy at that time responded nobly and cast their vote for the democratic form of government. Unfortunately, because of that act under existing law they were expatriated. Today the voice of America again rings out, and by the action of this House accomplished the first step in restoring their citizenship and doing simple justice.

I sincerely hope that this bill will be acted upon by the United States Senate in the near future in order that it may become law and that these Americans may come back to their families and their beloved country as quickly as possible.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALTER: On page 2, strike out all of line 2 and in line 3 the words "Chapter IV of the Nationality Act of 1940, as amended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMISSION INTO THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN SKILLED ALIENS

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 438, providing for the consideration of H. R. 3001, a bill to authorize the admission into the United States of certain aliens possessing certain skills, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3001) to authorize the admission into the United States of certain aliens possessing special skills. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half hour to my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] and 5 minutes to myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill made in order by this rule is to facilitate the entry into the United States of a limited number of aliens and the members of their immediate families. The bill will permit the entrance of aliens whose services will be beneficial to the interests of our country. This bill will fill a long-needed want from the standpoint of immigration requirements. I know that in my District there has been request after request by business houses, professions, and industries regarding the possibility of admitting into this country aliens who have a particular craft or a particular skill in which there is a great scarcity in this country.

This legislation is limited to entry of 3,200 and will not in any way expand the quota. After the alien is here for a year the Attorney General and Commissioner of Immigration will make a complete investigation of the immigrant in regard to his progress with the employer under whose supervision he was brought in. The purpose of the investigation is to verify that the entrance of the alien was 100 percent legitimate.

Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary and was reported unanimously by the Committee on Rules. I believe there is no opposition to the bill.

Before I leave the floor I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], chairman of the subcommittee, and also the Judiciary Committee and its members not only for bringing out this piece of legislation but for bringing out the bill which we just passed giving citizenship to so many of these Italian boys who went over to Italy to aid in the fight against communism. I know in my district we have a great number of Italian boys who went to Italy and lost their American citizenship when they engaged in the elections and voted in their elections. Several of these boys have been requesting me to file special bills to reinstate their American citizenship. The bill just passed will automatically reinstate their citizenship.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I want to join with the gentleman from Indiana in congratulating the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], chairman of the subcommittee and the other members of the subcommittee as well as the members of the full committee in reporting out both these bills. The bill made in order by this resolution meets a very important situation that arises from time to time; furthermore, it will enable a lot of outstanding men possessed of genius but who are citizens of other countries, men who despise the way of life that the Communist ideology stands for, men who believe in the dignity of the individual, to enter the United States and make valuable contributions to the general welfare and the national defense of our country, scientists, scholars, and trained mechanics. It might afford a very excellent opportunity, particularly in the manufacture of submarines, to bring in the very persons who would be of invaluable assistance to our country.

In relation to the other bill I also join with the gentleman from Indiana in commending the committee, because that is not only humane legislation, but also it is just legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. I thank the majority leader for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order the consideration of a piece of legislation which, in my opinion, is an extremely meritorious one. In fact it has been overdue for a considerable period of time. I know the members of the Committee on the Judiciary have had a very strenuous time in the past considering individual bills to meet the various situations that this piece of legislation would cover in a general way. As far as I know there is no opposition to the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM. I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts now addressing the House introduced a similar bill or a bill of the same purport, is that correct?

Mr. HERTER. Yes. The gentlemen of the committee know that last year I introduced a bill almost identical with this one on which hearings were held. The bill reported out by the committee is an improvement on the bill that I offered in that it makes certain of the genuineness of the skills of these people coming in by permitting them to come in under a temporary visa and not making them permanent entrants into this country until the genuineness of their skills have been thoroughly determined in actual practice.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOLIFIELD). The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD on H. R. 3001 and H. R. 6616 at the point in the RECORD where those bills were considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Foreign Skilled Personnel Admission Act."

SEC. 2. When used in this act, the term—

(a) "Board" means the Foreign Skilled Personnel Board created pursuant to this act.

(b) "Eligible foreign specialist" means a quota immigrant as defined in section 5 of the Immigration Act of May 26, 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 155; 8 U. S. C. 205), who is seeking to enter the United States and whose services are urgently needed in the United States by the United States Government or any of its departments, agencies, or bureaus, or by a commercial, industrial, financial, educational, or health institution, firm, or corporation, from the standpoint of national defense, public security, or because of highly skilled technical, medical, or scientific training, experience, or ability of such person, such services being prospectively beneficial to the United States.

SEC. 3. A number of special temporary visas, not to exceed 3,200 in any fiscal year, shall be issued without regard to quota limitations to eligible foreign specialists, and their spouses and their unmarried children under 21 years of age, if accompanying or following to join them: Provided, That the admission of such eligible foreign specialists has been recommended to the Secretary of State and to the Attorney General by the Board.

SEC. 4. Any agency described in section 2 of this act, claiming the necessity of the admission into the United States of an eligible foreign specialist, may file with the Board a petition, in such form as may be prescribed by regulations promulgated by the Board, requesting the permission to import such eligible foreign specialist.

SEC. 5. Upon basis of a finding that there is an urgent and special need for the services of an eligible foreign specialist specifically identified under the provisions of section 4 of this act, and that the same will yield a substantial benefit to the defense, or the security, or the economy, or the health of the United States, the Board shall recommend the temporary admission of such eligible foreign specialists to the Secretary of State and the Attorney General in a manner provided for by regulations to be promulgated by the Board.

SEC. 6. There is hereby created a board to be known as the Foreign Skilled Personnel Board which shall consist of seven members. The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall each appoint one member of the Board. The members of the Board shall select a chairman from among their number for a term not to exceed two fiscal years.

SEC. 7. The members of the Board shall receive no compensation for their services as such, but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of their duties as members of the Board. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums of money as may be necessary to enable the Board to discharge its duties. Within the limits of such funds as may be appropriated to the Board or as may be allocated to it by the President, the Board may employ necessary personnel without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and make provisions for necessary supplies, facilities, and services to carry out the provisions and accomplish the purposes of this act. It shall be the duty of the Board to formulate and issue regulations, necessary under the provisions of this act, and in compliance therewith, for the admission into the United States of eligible foreign specialists and the members of their families. It shall also be the duty of the Board to report, on July 1 of each year, to the Attorney General on the situation regarding the employment of eligible foreign specialists in the United States.

SEC. 8. If, at the expiration of 12 months immediately following the admission into the United States of an eligible foreign specialist, the Attorney General shall, upon application filed with the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization by the alien, find that such person has maintained the employment with the institution upon which application such person has been admitted into the United States, he is hereby authorized and directed to amend the record of such alien's temporary admission, and the records of admission of the members of his family admitted under the provisions of section 3 of this act, to show admission for permanent residence as of the date of their respective actual entry into the United States: Provided, That no change in employment which may occur by the written consent of the agency or institution importing the alien under the provisions of this act shall preclude such alien from having his record of admission amended according to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 9. Any person or persons who knowingly violate or conspire to violate any provision of this act shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $10,000, or shall be imprisoned not less than 2 or more than 10 years, or both.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, strike out lines 8 to 11, inclusive, and on page 2, lines 1 to 8, inclusive, and insert the following:

"(b) 'Eligible foreign specialist' means an alien, as defined in section 28, subsection (b) of the act of May 26, 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 168; 8 U. S. C. 224), who is seeking to enter the United States and whose services are urgently needed in the United States by the United States Government or any of its departments, agencies, or bureaus, or by a commercial, industrial, financial, educational, or health institution, or firm, or corporation, public or private, from the standpoint of national defense, public security, or because of highly skilled technical, medical, professional, or scientific training, experience, or ability of such person, such services being prospectively beneficial to the United States."

On page 2, strike out lines 21 to 25, inclusive, and on page 3, lines 1 to 4, inclusive, and insert the following:

"SEC. 3. A number of passport visas, not to exceed 3,200 in any fiscal year, may be issued to eligible foreign specialists as nonimmigrants under the provisions of subsection (2) of section 3 of the act of May 26, 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 154; 8 U. S. C. 203), and to their spouses and their unmarried children under 21 years of age, if accompanying or following to join them: Provided, That the passport visas issued to such spouses and unmarried children under 21 years of age shall be in addition to and shall not be included in the total number of 3,200 passport visas to be issued annually to eligible foreign specialists: And provided further, That the admission into the United States of such eligible foreign specialists shall have been recommended to the Secretary of State and to the Attorney General by the Board."

Page 3, line 20, after the word "agency", insert "or institution."

Page 5, strike out lines 16 to 25, inclusive, and on page 6, lines 1 to 8, inclusive, and insert the following:

"SEC. 8. If, at the expiration of 12 months immediately following the admission into the United States of an eligible foreign specialist, the Attorney General shall, upon application filed with the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization by the alien, find that such person has maintained the employment with the agency or institution upon which application such person has been admitted into the United States, he is hereby authorized and directed to amend the record of such alien's temporary admission, and the records of admission of the members of his family admitted under the provisions of section 3 of this act, to show admission for permanent residence as of the date of their respective last entries into the United States: Provided, That no change in employment which may occur by the written consent of the agency or institution importing the alien under the provisions of this act shall preclude such alien from having his record of admission amended according to the provisions of this section: And provided further, That upon being notified by the Attorney General of the amendment of the record of admission of an eligible foreign specialist and the members of his family, admitted into the United States temporarily in accordance with the provisions of this section the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct the requisite numbers from the immigration quota or quotas to which such foreign specialist and the members of his family are chargeable."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the committee on this bill, and especially to refer to page 4 of the report of the committee. On page 4 of the report of the committee there is this comment:

> Without making the provisions of H. R. 8001 retroactive, the committee has agreed to express its belief that the Secretary of State and the Attorney General in cooperation with the Foreign Skilled Personnel Board would have the opportunity, under the terms of this bill, to adjust the immigration status of such aliens, many of whom perform at this time very valuable work in the fields of education, medicine, national security and defense, technical progress, etc.

I am glad to say that it is the intent of the committee, as stated in this particular excerpt that I have read, that the Attorney General, in the administration of this act, will issue a special regulation or regulations. These regulations will cover the particular persons stated in this excerpt and will permit persons qualified as specialists, who are already in this country under various temporary permits, particularly students, and for example, nuns or people in religious orders engaged in educational pursuits, to remain in this country.

May I say further that I believe it is a good thing, because I feel it will make foreign students, who are now in the country learning certain specialties outlined in this bill, feel that there is a place for them in this country if they desire to remain. This provision assures them that they will not be summarily deported because they publicly made such an election or tried for permanent immigration when they are on a student status, but can remain here permanently when they have or succeed in obtaining such qualifications or special skills encompassed by this act. It is a pleasure to know the Members of the House Legislative Committee agree with this interpretation of the meaning of the provisions of the act.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Speaker, immigration to the United States has gone through two stages: First, when we sought immigrants to develop our country; the second stage came when we found that it was necessary to fix quotas so as to limit immigration.

However, during that period no attention was given to the needs of the United States. Immigration was on a basis of first come, first served, with the result that during the last few years there have been many private bills introduced for the purpose of permitting a particularly skilled person to come to the United States.

As an example of some of those bills, and our distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] will recognize this one, there is a Chinese scientist that Harvard University would like to have; there are institutions that require certain types of physicians; there is a Latvian loom maker who, if he could come to the United States, would be able to provide work for upwards of 300 American citizens.

A Greek textile engineer is under contract with a North Carolina firm, and if given permission to come to the United States will perfect some sort of an innovation in the work being done in that factory, and it is expected that will provide employment for upwards of 600 Americans.

The Koppers Co. in the State of Pennsylvania sought the services of a very distinguished scientist who had lived in Canada since he was 3 years old but, because he had been born in Austria, could not come to the United States except under the Austrian quota, which is oversubscribed for upward of 7 years.

This is the first attempt to give consideration to the needs of the United States in granting permission to aliens, citizens of other countries, to come to the United States. We believe it is the forerunner, perhaps, of legislation which will give that question greater consideration than it is intended to be given under this measure.

The over-all immigration will not be increased by this bill because with each of the people selected under this measure there will be the appropriate number deducted from the quota available to the country whence he comes. It will not in anywise increase the immigration.

As one of the members of the committee put it in a recent hearing, we will get a doctor instead of a bartender in the event that a doctor is needed.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? I have two questions.

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McSWEENEY. First, it will not seriously compete with any definite skilled group in America? It will be a noncompetitive thing?

Mr. WALTER. It will not compete with any skilled group in America because the institution or firm desiring the services of this particular person will have to make out to this Board a case showing the need for the particular skills this proposed immigrant possesses, and the fact that a person possessing similar qualifications is not readily available in this country.

Mr. McSWEENEY. The second question is, if a man is in the profession of medicine or is an engineer, what have we in the country set up as a safeguard to be assured that this man is a capable doctor, say, and is practicing as he should practice, fulfilling the same requirements as we impose in the case of an American physician?

Mr. WALTER. Of course these people would have to meet the requirements of the several States. Just recently the Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill introduced by the distinguished minority leader. In that particular case the State of Massachusetts indicated that this man was qualified to practice medicine in the State of Massachusetts, and the institution to which he was attached certified that his services were badly needed and that if he was not continued in the position he then occupied the services rendered by the hospital would be very seriously affected. In each one of these cases there is the question, of course, of the ability of the alien to comply with the particular State licensing laws.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. FORAND. I have been reading this bill very closely. I am very happy to go along and support it, because I think this would apply to a case in which I have been very much interested, the Rhode Island case, so called, regarding four or five Latvian specialists who are required for the operation of a plant at Woonsocket.

Mr. WALTER. Exactly. That is the type of immigrant that would come in under this measure, instead of the man whose name happens to be at the top of the quota list for Latvia for the moment.

Mr. FORAND. In other words, we are interested in doing some good for the community as a whole rather than for one individual?

Mr. WALTER. These skilled people are simply given a preferential status.

Mr. FORAND. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for three additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, one of the most unusual and important situations that has developed recently affecting a great industry of this country and the world, the jobs and livelihood of millions of people, to which I call your attention, was the action of the British Government on its trade and exchange practices on the imports of oil from other than British sources.

This proposal, which was announced by the British Government last December, placing an embargo on petroleum products from other than British sources has its further implications in other western European countries.

Such an unwise, untimely, and far-reaching announcement was initiated under the guise of saving British foreign-exchange resources. It is now obvious that it was actually designed to obtain long-term commercial advantages for the British and British-Dutch oil companies at the expense of our American industry.

This pronouncement and act on the part of our British friends is in direct conflict with established policies in our efforts to help save the British economy and shows little appreciation in this instance for the tremendous aid made available since the war.

Such an embargo against imports of dollar oil is a further example of the economic barriers which have prevented full realization that was intended and expected with Marshall aid funds.

It is, therefore, not surprising to note the announcement just made that the British Government is submitting a new proposal that will ease such an embargo in a very limited way.

There scarcely could have been a more ill-conceived or untimely action than this original imposition of such an embargo at the very moment talks were going forward last December between our two countries on the general subject of trade and the specific subject of oil.

This is an intricate and important subject. It requires a most careful approach instead of such an impartial ill-considered act.

To be sure it is full of implications of governmental policy for Britain but the implications on our foreign policy and the threat of enormous and increased import surpluses in this country, endangering the health and strength of our own domestic industry and economy is certainly involved. It has a most important effect and impact on free world trade in petroleum products.

There is something about such an attempt that smirks in the darkness and needs to be brought to light. In fact, the entire question and all of the problems regarding the petroleum industry should be reviewed. This is the view of the members of our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who visited Europe last fall and studied this very question. Unfortunately, I did not get to make the trip but in view of this interest and the information received, the Petroleum subcommittee is preparing to conduct a further study of this subject that the facts may be brought to light and a proper solution to many of these problems determined.

No one has any quarrel with the British desire to balance their international payments, especially in terms of dollars. Our attitude in assisting in this desire is expressed in the European recovery program.

On the other hand, achievement of proper balance by precipitously cutting off imports of dollar oil can but have a far-reaching effect on the industry which has supplied a big portion of British trade. It seems not only precipitous, but obviously flinging our friendly assistance right back into our face.

It is a one-sided action during the time that we are asked for further tax money for ECA financing of the refineries, exploration, and facilities that will allow the British to supply their own needs in place of meeting part of them from us. The resulting supply of oil in the world markets can but have and in fact, is already having, a material effect on imports into the United States and our home industry.

We have already in this country since the war cut back approximately 1,000,000 barrels of oil per day and by further threats of continued imports there is no telling how much further it will be necessary to cut back our own production.

Two years ago, when the European recovery program was before the Congress your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, conducted extensive hearings on the place of petroleum in the recovery program.

The committee issued a report at that time which was called to your attention. It emphasized that of the sixteen or seventeen billion dollars then proposed as the cost of the European recovery program, over one-fourth would be involved in oil and in facilities for producing and marketing oil products.

A large part of this money was proposed to be spent in making oil purchases directly. Large sums were proposed for building refineries in Europe for refining oil, principally from the Middle East. An additional sum was proposed for the exploration, development, and production of oil, principally by the British in the Middle East. Some of you may remember that I proposed an amendment during the consideration of the ECA bill designed to clarify this situation toward preventing just what has resulted in the last few weeks.

Last year, the committee heard the ECA Administrator, Mr. Paul Hoffman, on developments and the tremendous problems with which he was faced in connection with this part of the program. He explained the difficulties which they were encountering and that the financing of European refineries by ECA funds did present an enormous problem.

On the one hand it was desirable to save dollar-exchange resources; on the other hand, it was not desirable to overbuild refinery capacity with our own taxpayers' money to create oil-product surpluses on the world markets that in turn would mean further trouble, impose restrictions, and invoke embargoes.

At that time, the European nations were asking for more refinery capacity than necessary for their own needs. Mr. Hoffman appropriately directed further study. The European nations themselves made a further report last October.

I have supported the ECA program. I felt it was necessary to restore the economy of western Europe, devastated by the tragic war. I felt it was necessary to prevent continued Communist aggression and without it I firmly believe all of those countries would now be dominated by communistic ideologies.

However, I did not propose, and it was not so intended that economic windfalls develop and selfish advantages promoted, but here is an example of what happened. The ECA nations themselves, in their report in October, tremendously reduced their refinery plans. ECA officials told them they asked for more than they needed and they reduced their request to 45 percent.

Just what is the effect of this and other such plans?

I think the National Petroleum Council, composed of men from all phases of the American industry, established for the purpose of advising the Secretary of the Interior on petroleum matters, would be good authority. They recently had a meeting in Washington. In their report to the Secretary of Interior on the British embargo, they said:

> The data indicate that the British and British-Dutch oil companies are, and propose to continue, expanding their facilities to produce and refine oil in amounts substantially in excess of the amounts they could reasonably expect to sell on a competitive basis.

The Council concluded in its report to the Secretary:

> The British policies, if continued, could compel the petroleum industry of this Nation to surrender the international oil trade to the British, because the dollar markets of the United States could not possibly absorb sufficient imports to satisfy the concession obligations of the American-owned foreign concessions, without demoralizing the domestic industry with consequent serious injury to the domestic economy and national security.

I think this is a fair conclusion of the actual situation and accurately surmises what we might expect.

It can very well be pointed out also that these restrictions by the British work in two ways.

In the first place we traditionally have been exporters to Europe of refined products. By cutting us off quite naturally leaves such refined products on our home market. This further reduces production and curtails refining and further affects the economy by putting a lot of people out of work. In addition to reducing production beyond a safe measure for the best conservation practices, it reduces jobs, employment.

In the second place, by requiring that all of the crude oil coming to British refineries must come only from nondollar sources, this cuts off the only other important market American companies in Venezuela and the Middle East have except the United States. This can only mean more and more imports or curtailment of our American companies operating abroad.

We can take care of only so much imports and we should supplement our industry with appropriate and adequate imports. Going beyond the limit not only means a displaced industry here but in the curtailing of our American companies, operations abroad vitally affects our foreign policies and agreements we have with certain nations.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a simple question. Certainly as I say there is a place for oil imports in the home market but again there is a point beyond which imports will do untold damage to one of the most important industries in America.

There is little wonder that the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, has too just announced that he is greatly alarmed over the situation.

Certainly the purchase of oil and oil products presents a current large requirement to the British of dollars which they desire in part to save. It is also true that immediate saving of dollars in the long term may mean a significant change in the complexion of the world oil picture.

Therefore, it is only proper that serious and deliberate discussions on such a vital topic continue and that actions be taken as the result of weighty consideration.

I think, and evidently the Secretary of State thinks, as well as the oil industry of this country, that someone in Britain acted very hasty in announcing such unilateral action last December.

Perhaps it was the same party who wrote the members of the British Commonwealth that "The Americans have, as expected, not gone beyond expressing regret at proposals" to substitute the surplus production by British companies for dollar oil imported into the sterling area. I have a copy of this letter, which I will include with the statement because it clearly sets out, I think, the full effect of the British proposals. It is an amazing and interesting statement. It was made in December which makes the announcement yesterday even more important. Evidently there must be a definite retreat from this frank position, recognizing the colossal blunder.

When our committee completes its investigation on this and the other problems in the field of petroleum, we will again advise the House and the Congress that you may know what is going on in the programs that we provide in the best interest for our people and our future security.

The following is a letter addressed to the east African government at Nairobi by the British Secretary of State:

DECEMBER 19, 1949.

OIL SUPPLIES

Following the meeting of Ministers in Washington in September, a special group of officials was formed in Washington to consider oil problems. In this group, United Kingdom representatives explained in detail how the dollar drain in oil arises and made it plain that in the immediate future United Kingdom would be obliged to adopt a policy of substitution in sterling for dollar oil to reduce the drain. In this it is hoped to secure the cooperation of sterling commonwealth countries.

2. Until recently cost of dollar oil which British companies had to buy in order to meet the gap between their supply and demand represented a dollar outgoing over and above the dollar expenditure incurred in producing their own oil. These "deficit" purchases—apart from speciality oils have now ended and in coming years it is expected that British companies' availability of fuel oil and possibly of other products will exceed their normal trade requirements. In the immediate future the surpluses are not expected to be substantial except in the case of fuel oil (which does not (repeat not) include gas oil or Diesel oil).

3. United States Government have now been informed of substance of proposals for substituting this surplus production by British companies for dollar oil imported into the sterling area by United Kingdom companies. The Americans have, as expected, not gone beyond expressing regret at proposals and steps have now been taken to put scheme into effect in United Kingdom and to obtain cooperation of dominion governments. It is now desired to arrange full substitution of sterling fuel oil for dollar oil at present imported into east Africa for inland consumption. It is not (repeat not) intended to substitute sterling oil for fuel oil imports destined for use in ships' bunkers.

4. By "substitution" is meant replacement of dollar oil imports by equivalent imports from British-controlled sources. It is not intended to interfere with United States companies' internal distribution business. For this purpose "dollar oil" means the oil which United States-controlled companies obtain from Standard (New Jersey) Standard Vacuum, Socony, Standard (California), Tex Oil Corp., and Caltex (or any of their associates such as Bahrein Petroleum Company). In this category there is not included oil which any of these American companies purchase and ship from British-controlled companies' sources, such as the Abadan and Curacao refineries.

5. United States-controlled companies would be left to decide whether they would make good the reduction in their imports of dollar oil by purchases from nondollar sources. Assurance has been given by British companies that they are in principle willing to sell their surplus fuel oil to American companies, but these arrangements can be left to commercial negotiations between British and American companies. Should an American distributing company decide to curtail its trade, British companies or, indeed, other American companies should have little difficulty in taking over the additional business. Anything more than minor curtailment of this kind appears unlikely judging by the attitude of the head offices of United States companies in the general discussions Ministry of Fuel and Power have had with them.

6. British companies are not expected to have any appreciable surpluses in the near future of products other than fuel oil. In the case of fuel oil, there will be more than enough available from British-controlled companies' production in 1950 to take the place of all dollar imports of fuel oil for inland consumption in the commonwealth. Failure to dispose of this fuel-oil output may well result in a reduction in British companies' output of other products. On this account and because of the important dollar saving that can be achieved United States-controlled companies importing into the United Kingdom have been informed of intention to introduce fuel-oil substitution in respect of all their imports from dollar sources as from the 1st of January 1950. I hope that the east African governments will be able to operate fuel-oil substitution from the same date, though some postponement may have to be accepted, e. g., to enable the companies to adjust their shipping programs.

7. United States companies with whom Ministry of Fuel and Power have discussed arrangements for substitution in the United Kingdom may be warning their subsidiaries in east Africa that similar arrangements may be applied to their imports.

8. I must leave it to the colonial governments to decide how substitution can best be administered. Should there be difficulty in controlling the source of fuel-oil imports by a system of cargo licensing, etc., it should be possible to ensure sterling origin on imports by ad hoc arrangements agreed with the companies on whom will rest the onus of proof.

9. Any fuel-oil imports by United States companies which are already being bought by them from British-controlled companies will, of course, rank as sterling oil, but oil supplied from Bahrein although invoiced in sterling ranks as dollar oil for the purpose of substitution, since Bahrein is fundamentally a dollar source.

10. Please inform me as soon as possible of the action being taken.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for 5 minutes in support of the amendment.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HESELTON. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON] on January 25 introduced a resolution, a rather comprehensive resolution, intended to recommend a national fuel policy. Being a member of the subcommittee under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], I would like to ask at this time if the inquiry will be extended to include possibly the development of a national fuel policy?

Mr. HARRIS. Insofar as the discussions in the committee are concerned thus far, I do not believe there has been any intention up to this time to go into it any further than with reference to petroleum. I assume you are talking about electrical energy, coal, and all other phases of the fuel industry?

Mr. HESELTON. I am.

Mr. HARRIS. There has been no indication that such an extensive hearing and investigation will be undertaken. I think we will have our hands full, however, in going into the problems of the petroleum industry itself.

Mr. HESELTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make inquiry of the chairman of the subcommittee. Over a year ago I visited one of our nationally advertised clothing manufacturing concerns located in the city of Chicago. While there I was impressed by the operators of this plant with the scarcity of highly skilled hand tailors in that establishment. As I looked back over this large manufacturing room, I noticed that the men who were working in the coat-making section of this plant were all men from 60 to 75 years of age. I inquired of him as to why no younger tailors were available. He said that the young American boys did not care to go into that type of work; that they prefer to go into radio, automobile manufacturing, and other types of mechanical work, and that there was a great scarcity of hand craft, skilled tailors in the Nation, due to the fact that in times past most of our hand craft, skilled tailors came from foreign countries.

The question I wish to ask is this: Under the terms of this bill, would it be possible for highly skilled tailors to come in?

Mr. WALTER. Yes. Under section 5 the situation the gentleman is discussing is dealt with. In section 6, which has to do with the board, you will find the board is provided for which will pass on the question of whether or not these people actually are skilled, within the provisions of the law, and whether it is possible to obtain the services of people possessing similar skills in the United States. Very definitely, in the type of case the gentleman is talking about, people could be covered by this law.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I am glad to have that assurance, because I know that some of our great clothing manufacturing plants have in the last few years moved into Canada, just for the reason that they could not obtain the type of skilled employees they need. They have set up branch manufacturing plants in Canada, due to the foresight of the Canadian Government in making provision that such highly skilled people could come into Canada. I am glad to see that the bill provides for that, and I am heartily in support of it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] has expired.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I am conscious, as I know most of the Members are conscious, of the dearth of physicians in the rural areas of this country. I wish to inquire of the very able chairman of the subcommittee which has reported this bill, whether or not this bill will permit the entrance into this country of doctors and physicians who may be brought to our rural areas, to serve our rural people with adequate medical service.

Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer the question as to whether or not doctors from Vienna, for instance, may be brought into this country to work in rural areas?

Mr. WALTER. The doctors may be brought here, of course, if they qualify under the State laws and are eligible to practice in the several States. I am sure the gentleman is concerned with the question of who would make the showing before the Board; that is, what legal entity could make the presentation requesting these services. I believe that if the gentleman examines the language on page 2, line 16, he will reach the conclusion that any corporation, public or private, may make the application. In the case the gentleman has in mind I should think that the commissioners of the county could make the application to the Board requesting permission to bring a certain doctor into that particular community.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Has any evidence been submitted to the gentleman's committee indicating that any doctor, lawyer, or dentist in Vienna, or any other European country, desires to come here under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. WALTER. Yes; as a matter of fact the committee just reported two private bills, one by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] and the other by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] for the relief of two doctors who are in the United States attached to institutions in New York and in Massachusetts, who have been prevailed upon by the authorities of those institutions to attempt to remain here and continue the work they are presently engaged in.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand, the gentleman stated that if a small community desires the services of a Canadian doctor, for example, that that community may through its county commissioners or its city government petition the Board created by this bill, and the Board will give consideration to such an application permitting him to come in under these circumstances so that this alien doctor will practice in that community; is that right?

Mr. WALTER. That is the intention of the committee.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a good bill, and I am gladly supporting it for that very purpose.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H. R. 301 which has been introduced by the able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER], chairman of the subcommittee. This bill will, I believe, afford necessary relief to cases such as one with which I am personally acquainted. This case involves two Burmese nurses who gave so much voluntary aid and assistance to our soldiers during the famous march of Bataan. Their ready and able and unselfish service made it possible to save many lives and to ease the pain of many of our soldiers.

Today these nurses are serving and studying under student visas in a hospital in New Jersey. However, they are always subject to deportation if they overstay, or will be compelled to leave when their time of visit expires. This would subject them to return to an unfriendly atmosphere.

I think this would hardly be gratitude for two heroines of the war.

They are skilled and their services are necessary. I believe that cases such as theirs would be covered by this bill—at least I am hopeful that it would be so. Therefore, I support it.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article stressing the great importance of the poultry industry in the State of Connecticut which this week is celebrating Poultry Week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas (at the request of Mr. HARRIS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

PROGRAM FOR THE WEEK OF FEBRUARY 6, 1950

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to ask my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts, about the program for next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. On Monday the Consent Calendar will be called, and we will take up the bill (S. 88) to amend section 60 of the Bankruptcy Act.

Tuesday: On Tuesday the Private Calendar will be called, and we will take up the bill S. 2319, the far eastern aid bill.

Wednesday is Calendar Wednesday.

I have no further program for next week to announce at this time except to say that, of course, should any conference reports be filed they are always in order. Any further program for the remainder of the week I will announce as quickly as I possibly can.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Can the distinguished majority leader give us any inkling of what might come up on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is the first committee on the call, that the next one is the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that the third is the Committee on Education and Labor. I have no definite knowledge. My interest in that day, of course, cannot be as direct as it is in other days, because what bills are called up on that day are matters that lie with the chairman of the committees. On last Wednesday, however, I was informed that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MURRAY] had several bills that he could call up on Calendar Wednesday.

I assume that same situation will exist for next Wednesday. I am also informed that the Committee on the District of Columbia will probably have some bills.

That is the best information I can give to the gentleman at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE FROM THURSDAY UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE SUBPENAING OF A MEMBER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privilege of the House and send to the desk a subpena which has been served on me and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, HOLDING A CRIMINAL COURT FOR SAID DISTRICT—THE UNITED STATES V. HAROLD ROLAND CHRISTOFFEL, NO. 791–47, CRIMINAL DOCKET

The President of the United States to JOHN LESINSKI, House of Representatives Office Building, 429 Old House Office Building.

You are hereby commanded to attend the said Court on Monday, the 6th day of February 1950 at 10 o'clock a. m. to testify on behalf of the defendant, and bring with you the Minute Book(s) of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Eightieth and Eighty-first Congresses of the United States and not depart the Court without leave thereof.

Witness, the Honorable Chief Justice of said Court, the 1st day of February A. D. 1950.

[SEAL] HARRY M. HULL, Clerk.
By EDWARD J. SKEENS,
Deputy Clerk.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under the precedents of the House, I am unable to comply with this subpena without the consent of the House, the privileges of the House being involved. I, therefore, submit the matter for the consideration of this body.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 460) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Representative JOHN LESINSKI, a Member of this House, has been served with a subpena duces tecum to appear as a witness before the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia to testify at 10 a. m., on the 6th day of February 1950, in the case of the United States v. Harold Roland Christoffel (No. 791–47, Criminal Docket); and

Whereas by the privileges of the House no Member is authorized to appear and testify but by the order of the House: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Representative JOHN LESINSKI is authorized to appear in response to the subpena duces tecum of the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia in the case of the United States v. Harold Roland Christoffel, at such time as when the House is not sitting in session, but shall not take with him the papers and records requested in said subpena; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena of the said court.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman for an inquiry.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to direct to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the membership of the House is the following: If there is documentary evidence in the possession of the House which may mean the difference between the establishment of the guilt or innocence of any person on trial, I do not think it will sit well with the American people for us to withhold that documentary evidence, irrespective of the character of the trial. A man is on trial. His liberty is at stake. Certain charges are made against him. The defendant applies to the court for a subpena duces tecum which is issued in the exercise of the discretion of the presiding judge. Here we now say in the House, "You shall not have this documentary evidence." If this documentary evidence establishes the innocence of the defendant, why should we withhold it? If, on the other hand, this documentary evidence establishes his guilt, again, why should we withhold it? I think we are establishing a very bad precedent here, and I say in furtherance of justice in our courts we should not withhold documents that will establish either the guilt or the innocence of any defendant, unless there happens to be something secret in these documents, the revelation of which might impair the security of the United States.

Mr. McCORMACK. I may say to the gentleman from New York, I do not know if he was here a few weeks ago when the House adopted a resolution permitting the records of the Eightieth Congress to be made available in accordance with the time-honored precedent that exists between the two branches of Government, the legislative and the judicial.

My friend from New York, I think, is proceeding upon a premise that does not exist. This resolution does not deny the records of the Eightieth Congress being made available. If the court finds that they are relevant, and the gentleman being a lawyer himself knows that, the question of the admissibility of evidence is a matter of law for the court to pass upon. Opportunity to examine the records has been given.

This resolution follows along the lines of another one, though he probably has forgotten it, but if he knew of it he would realize that the fears that he expresses are in no way involved. There is the resolution:

Whereas in the case of the United States v. Harold Roland Christoffel (No. 791–47, criminal docket), pending in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, subpena duces tecum was issued by the chief justice of said court and addressed to Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness before the said court on the 19th day of January 1950, at 10 o'clock antemeridian, and to bring with him certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such order thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the court named in the subpena duces tecum before mentioned, but shall not take with him any papers or documents on file in his office or under his control or in his possession as Clerk of the House; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpena duces tecum then the said court through any of its officers or agents have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of any documents or papers in possession or control of said clerk that the court has found to be material and relevant, except minutes and transcripts of executive sessions, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said clerk shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their file or custody under said clerk; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena aforementioned.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, then I would have no objection to the present resolution if the present resolution contained the same language. Your present resolution merely says, unless I am very much mistaken, that the gentleman from Michigan shall not produce these documents.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is, the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And it stops there.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes, but the documents of the Eightieth Congress are not in the possession of the gentleman from Michigan. They are in the possession of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and my friend knows that.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. All right. Why not state in that resolution, then, that if the court so decides on the materiality of this evidence——

Mr. McCORMACK. This resolution is directly related to the one I just read. They have to be considered together. Copies can be brought down by the Clerk if the court considers them to be material and relevant. We have already paved the way, if they will serve a subpena upon the proper person, who is the Clerk of the House of Representatives in connection with the records of the Eightieth Congress, and not the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The distinguished majority leader predicates this resolution, then, on the proposition that these documents are not within the control of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. McCORMACK. Not the documents of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. LESINSKI. In explanation, may I say that the minutes were made available, as was reported by my clerk, to the attorneys in this case. After they reviewed and went all over the minutes of the Eightieth Congress, the papers were returned to the custody of the Clerk.

They were not in possession of the papers of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. Every opportunity has been given to the attorneys for the defendant to see such records as are proper for them to see. Is that right?

Mr. LESINSKI. That is right.

Mr. McCORMACK. They should address the summons to the Clerk of the House. The gentleman from Michigan does not have possession of the records. We know that at the end of a Congress the Clerk of the House obtains possession and control of them. Therefore, we have done everything possible to cooperate with the defendant in presenting his case and to cooperate with the court. It is now a question for the court to pass upon the materiality and relevancy of the records.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. As a layman and, as a Member of the House, jealous of the rights and prerogatives of the Congress, I want to make this observation, and I invite the attention of my colleague [Mr. LESINSKI]. Appearing as a witness, if the question is presented to the gentleman with regard to whether or not a quorum was present, the gentleman should respectfully decline to answer the question and inform the court that this House is not beholden to the courts or in any way responsible to anyone outside its own membership. If that question was not raised in committee, it is out of order in the courts.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. As I understand, this resolution simply follows the precedents of the House?

Mr. McCORMACK. Exactly.

Mr. MICHENER. We had this same matter up and it was discussed very thoroughly in the last Congress, I believe. I think it was decided to the satisfaction of my friend from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]. May I ask him if that is not correct?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is correct. I see the point the majority leader is making. He contends that this subpena should be served on the Clerk of the House, who is the only person who has possession of the documents of the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. McCORMACK. And if they proceed in accordance with the previous resolution, it will be consistent with precedent.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Lowell Sun.

Mr. DAVENPORT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

Mr. HESELTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and to include extraneous material in each.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

AGRICULTURE IN MIDCENTURY

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, at the midpoint of the twentieth century, the performances of the American economy, and particularly American industry, are justly acknowledged to be perhaps the greatest economic achievements of modern history. Yet, at the very time that industry and commerce are at their peaks, the public is vaguely conscious that American agriculture is again passing through a period of stress, change, and difficulty which threaten further crisis.

To Americans who live in the great consuming areas of America, in huge urban centers, I say, "Learn more about the farmer. Learn of his life, his work, his problems. Try to appreciate the effort he puts forth to help all of us to the highest living standards in history."

ENORMOUS PRODUCTIVITY OF AMERICAN FARMERS

While most Americans are aware of the existence of agriculture, it often seems that they have little understanding of its real problems or of the critical fundamental role that agriculture plays in creating economic strength and stability. Our world has been shaken by the coming of machines and mass production and is now dominated by the miracles of industry and science, to an extent without parallel in the past. But even in the midst of this tide of technology and the resulting immense growth of cities and factories, the basic economic interest of humanity is still to draw from nature the food and sustenance upon which life depends.

The city dweller casually takes for granted an apparently inexhaustible food supply. He seldom thinks of the long struggle with nature which stands back of the great variety, immense quantity, and high quality of the fruits, meats, grains, vegetables, dairy products, or other commodities of the farm which are so easily purchased in a store. But far from being able to live solely by industry, the modern city dweller is more dependent upon the farmer than in any previous era.

In 1790 a city person consumed surplus products of about 19 farmers. Today on an average, three or four city dwellers are fed from the surplus production of one farmer. (Reference: Smith, J. R., and Phelps, N. O., The Place and Nature of Agriculture, Industrial and Commercial Geography, Holt, N. Y., 1947, p. 380.) As recently as 75 years ago, the majority of our people lived on farms or in farm communities, and more than half of all employment was in agriculture. Today, only a fifth of the populace is attached to farms and less than a fifth of the gainfully employed work in agriculture.

AGRICULTURE IS BASIC IN AMERICAN ECONOMY

Despite their decrease in percentage of population, agriculturalists remain among the most fundamental group, the most decentralized, the most widespread. Farming reaches across a billion acres, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. Farming is performed on a little less than 6,000,000 units, small and large. More than 28,000,000 people live on farms, 8,000,000 of them engaged directly in agricultural employment. (Reference: United States Census estimates.)

Even in the machine age, no nation can become commercially or industrially important until after it has developed sources of agricultural supplies. No nation can maintain its position for very long as an industrial leader unless its agricultural resources remain strong and productive.

Our own domestic agriculture is today the first and the basic resource of our national economy, after giving full recognition to the huge flow of goods in the world market. Factories must obtain much of their raw materials from agriculture. The population must be fed from the farmer's crops and livestock, and clothed from the wool and cotton which come from the farms.

Mines may be exhausted, industries outmoded, displaced, or transformed. But agriculture is continuously renewed. If well done it is a permanent resource, using Nature's laws of growth to replenish what is taken from Nature's store. In the long run, the firmest claim to strength, prosperity, and duration that our Nation or any nation has, is its soil. Its most important basic industry is agriculture.

The gulf of misunderstanding which today often prevents consumers from appreciating the place of agriculture, and the true service which the farmer renders to our national life, is the result of thinking that is influenced by the city-living and industrial employment which has become so important an activity of the American people. There is a loss of the realization that the land is the first of economic values, and farming the first of essential occupations. We have forgotten, as Ralph Waldo Emerson once said, that "the first farmer was the first man."

From this standpoint the greatest achievement of American economic history is the ability of so few farmers to feed and clothe so many. Only because of the tremendous strides in agricultural productivity in the last century it is possible today for a farm population representing only a fifth of the total to provide sustenance for 150,000,000 people and have something left over.

No other economy, no other group, has matched this accomplishment of American farmers. Because their efforts have been in the past so effective, the American people have been able to expand, to divert human energy to industry, to build great cities, and to become the most productive, richest, best fed, best clothed, best housed nation in the world. We boast that we are better off than others. We should recognize what we owe to American agriculture. It is well to remember that without the human sustenance brought from the earth there can be no well-being in the cities.

MISCONCEPTIONS ABOUT AGRICULTURE

This development is too often overlooked and conveniently forgotten by those who are mainly occupied with manufacturing, or whose lives are separated by the steel and concrete of the metropolis from contact with the land. Many American people having their roots in the soil tend to lose a clear grasp of the significance of agriculture to their well-being, and to underrate the degree to which their own welfare rests upon that of agriculture.

Thus, misled by impressions which they do not stop to examine, many housewives in the cities and a large part of the consuming public often blame the farmer for excessive food prices. They conclude without justice and without knowing the facts that farmers are gouging them, are growing rich at the expense of the Nation, or are receiving unearned and undeserved benefits.

There are many ways to answer this attitude, and a real need to correct it. Let the city family reflect upon the amount of effort which would be necessary if it were faced with the necessity of providing its own foodstuffs, the material for its own clothes, or even the transportation and distribution of these goods. But a farm family can still meet a large part of its basic needs independently, in a way that city folks cannot. It thus becomes apparent that in reality it is the consumer who enjoys the greater benefit of the exchange.

Modern farmers are not as completely self-sufficient as they were a century ago, or even 50 years ago. The efficient farmer today, producing enough to feed himself and also a number of city consumers besides, meets many more problems, much more complex, than his grandfather did in getting his products to the consumer.

If, for example, a housekeeper in the city buys a loaf of bread or a pound of meat, the price she pays includes not only the original price to the farmer who grew them. It also includes the cost of processing, storing, shipping, commission for wholesale merchants, and a reasonable profit to the grocer who serves her. These items of cost, and many more, must be met, not only to maintain efficient distribution of food, but to allow the farmer to be able to raise the food at all.

Out of every dollar that is spent for food generally much less than half actually goes back to the farmer. (Reference: Farmers in a Changing World, USDA Yearbook, 1940, p. 53 and following; also current 1949 bulletin.) What is more, this payment, small as it is, must suffice the farmer to buy the things he must have from industry to maintain himself and to meet the costs which go on regardless of his income. It is a fact that farmers receive, even in the best years, only a small percent of our national income. Often it is not enough to meet their minimum needs, their fixed costs, or the desirable level of consumption by themselves and their families of the products of industry.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I yield.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I wish to congratulate the gentleman for the wonderful contribution he is making to the cause of agriculture. He said a moment ago that agriculture was the first industry in the world, and, of course, it will be the last. The gentleman represents one of the greatest agricultural States in the Union. I wonder if he would mention the problem of soil conservation and its importance to the permanency of agriculture? I am sure the gentleman is aware that in his own State of Iowa is one of the pioneer counties in soil conservation in the United States, namely, Marion County. It was one of the first and has gone further in the practice of soil conservation than any county in any State in the Union.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I thank the gentleman, my colleague from Iowa, for his statement. I will touch upon the question of soil conservation a little later in my remarks.

FARMER TAKES RISKS—ALWAYS

The revolution in industry and the impact of the machine age upon agriculture have created the so-called agricultural problem, which is, in fact, a host of related problems. To understand what is involved, it is necessary to have a clear idea of the essential difference between agriculture and industry. Unlike the manufacturer, the farmer must be a perpetual pioneer. He must take risks that he cannot control. He must produce over a relatively long period for a future market. He is unable to cut his losses or increase his gains by any immediate action once he has begun the process of production. Nature largely determines the course of agricultural output. The farmer may plant and tend his crops with care, raise them to full ripeness, and then lose the fruits of his labor overnight through a sudden change in weather or a drought.

The farmer cannot turn a switch and stop his corn from growing. He cannot speed the time it takes for a calf to grow and give milk or halt the cow from giving because prices have changed. He must plan his production ahead, often for several years.

The same conditions affect farmer's costs. Every year he must pay fixed costs in cash for taxes, interest, seed, fertilizer, equipment, repairs, fuel, and many other items. The prices he receives are sensitive to every change in demand, every fluctuation of supply. He is in direct competition with every other producer. The prices of farm goods are inescapably competitive and flexible.

The prices of the goods the farmer must buy are relatively inflexible, much less competitive, and usually much higher in proportion to what he receives. Moreover, the farmer is always subject to monopoly forces in other branches of the economy. When prices of industrial products are fixed at high levels through monopoly or rigid costs in industry, while farm products are sold competitively, the farmer cannot bargain on equal terms. If he sells in competition with other farmers to great distributing organizations that are in a position to pick and choose, to wait him out or go elsewhere, he cannot hold his bargaining position and is forced to sacrifice by taking what he can get at the moment.

As a result, the farmer may find that if he cuts production, the price gap between industrial goods and his crops remains and he is left with a smaller income. If he increases production his own prices may fall in a glutted market, and he is no better, but frequently worse off.

It is this inequality, this profound distinction between agriculture and industry that has produced a continuous crisis for the farmer throughout the last 30 years. It has been stated by a leading expert on the subject that in contrast to industry American farmers for the past generation have been compelled to sell their output almost continuously below the actual cost of production. (Reference: Zimmerman, E., World Resources and Industries, pp. 162–171.)

LOSSES SUFFERED BY AGRICULTURE

The truth of this statement is borne out by the memory of what the farmers have experienced since 1919. For agriculture, the great depression began in the price fall of 1920–21, immediately after World War I. Throughout the twenties the distress of farmers was reflected in mounting debts and mortgages, increasingly tight credit, a loss of agricultural purchasing power, and an inability to make the ends of costs and incomes meet, or even to stay near one another. That was certainly the plight of American farming in the fabulous twenties.

When a depression occurred in industry and finance in 1929, in large part caused by the years of agricultural distress, the meaning of these conditions became grimly evident. During the years from 1929 to 1933 the output of agriculture declined only 6 percent but the prices of farm products fell 63 percent; in no other field of activity was there a remotely similar behavior. In manufactures it was output which declined: 80 percent in farm machinery, 80 percent in automobiles, 83 percent in steel, while prices fell only 6 percent to 16 percent, or at most 20 percent. Failures and foreclosures, further loss of purchasing power, and despair of recovery were the farmer's share on an ever greater scale. (Reference: Zimmerman, E., World Resources and Industries, Harper, N. Y., 1938, pp. 161–170; Smith and Phillips, loc. cit.)

During World War II, responding to the pleas and needs of the Nation, and the cry of allied peoples for food, American agriculture produced magnificent crops efficiently, cheaply, and in unmatched variety and quality. It is a known fact that the average American family had more to eat, and ate better during the war years, than ever before. At the same time, our farmers produced such an abundance of food that we had surpluses to share with our allies.

Now again in a postwar period, the economy is prosperous, but the difficulties of the farmer are increasing. There have been ominous warning signs of a renewal of the agricultural crisis. There is a growing gap between the prices of what the farmer sells and the machines, fuel, and necessaries he must buy to keep on producing.

In the Midwest, it has been estimated that farm prices have gone down for many products an average of 50 percent, while prices of some farm supplies have risen 25 percent within the postwar years. These opposing spirals are dangerous, a peril to the whole economy. (Reference: USDA indexes show that eggs and some other dairy products decline was more than this, in period September 1947 to September 1949, while farm machinery index went up nearly one-third.)

Here are some very interesting comments derived from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics concerning the squeeze that the farmers of the Midwest, the food producers of this Nation, are now undergoing.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture summarizes the price spreads between the farmers and the consumers by computing the annual retail cost of a market basket of food for a family of three average consumers together with the distribution of this cost between the farmer and the marketing system. At the prices prevailing in July 1948, the annual retail cost of this market basket for three people would have been $712.

In October 1949 the same quantity of food could be purchased for $637. During this period the retail cost of an annual food supply for a family of three fell $75. The farm price of this food fell $69. Charges made for services performed after the commodities left the farm declined only $6. Of the $75 decline in cost, the farmer absorbed $69.

It seems to me that the farmer is entitled to receive a dollar for every dollar's worth he sells, and get a dollar's worth for every dollar he spends.

One fact is emphatic, certain, and clear. A free and democratic society cannot afford to be indifferent or neglectful of the welfare of agriculture and the farmers. Such indifference or neglect risks the loss of a vital source of our strength, our future well-being, and our ability to remain a fortress of independence and freedom in the world.

CITY PEOPLE SHOULD KNOW MORE ABOUT FOOD PRODUCTION

To the men and women living in our great cities, I say again, "Learn more about the farmer."

The farmer is not to blame for the seemingly high prices you pay for food. His share is only a minor percentage of the final price to the consumer. Remember that the factory worker who packs food or the transportation worker who moves it to markets across the Nation, belongs to unions which obtain high wages. But the farmer is not organized in the same way. He receives for his labor, his patient and lengthy struggle with the elements and the soil, whatever supply and demand may bring.

If the farmer has no purchasing power, American factories lose a vast potential market. If the farmer is forced or permitted to live in depression, his situation influences the entire economy. In time it will undermine prosperity. Industry cannot remain prosperous while agriculture goes into bankruptcy. If the farmer is not given a genuine chance to establish his economic life on a sound basis, the banker, the manufacturer, the union member, and the office worker will in the years to come feel the effects of his loss. Towns, cities, and industry cannot flourish if the country, the land, and farming decay.

The well-being of the farmer and of the consumer in the city are inseparable links in the great chain of production. When both prosper, the whole economy goes forward, the standard of living rises, and the Nation's growth is assured. It is therefore the direct concern of the consumer to know, to aid, and to promote the farmer's interest as his own. The consumer should recognize the achievements of agriculture as benefits to himself. He should develop his own economic future by helping the farmer to do the same. Despite the changed position of agriculture in the modern era of science, industry, and urbanization, men must not forget the fruit of the land, and the work of the farm that sustains their lives.

A FARM PROGRAM SUGGESTED

There is a disagreement as to what ought to be done to meet the situation. A study of the whole matter has caused me to come to the following tentative conclusions for an agricultural plan which might be satisfactory and produce a rational and workable program for United States agriculture.

First. Commodity loans as practiced over the past decade or more are a proven way to support the prices on basic nonperishable commodities.

This plan has worked well and has very substantial support from the farmers themselves.

Second. The support of perishable commodities is a very difficult matter. Compensatory payments on important perishable commodities such as eggs, pork and butter seem necessary to prevent loss to the producer where no other method is feasible. Otherwise, the Commodity Credit Corporation finds itself holding perishable goods off the market at great expense for so long that they spoil and become worthless.

If price support is to be given to perishables, which was not contemplated in the beginning of the price-support program, then compensatory payments may be the answer as a last resort and as a temporary measure to cushion unreasonable price declines.

Third. Flexible price support should apply to both types of commodities, perishable and nonperishable. It is designed to bring about a balanced production and avoid excessive surpluses. Use of flexible price supports will minimize the necessity for compensatory payments for perishables, and will be a means of preventing overproduction of nonperishables, and help us to avoid police state controls.

Fourth. Present program consists principally of acreage controls with minimum soil conservation practices involved. The new program should re-establish and strengthen those conservation practices as begun in the period before the war.

This suggestion is quite different from the so-called Brannan plan. That proposal, it appears, promises "farmers, high prices; consumers, cheap food; and it isn't going to cost anybody" much.

The proposal would result in making mendicants out of farmers because their net income would be dependent upon Government hand-outs. It could not possibly mean cheap food unless the subsidies ran into many billions. Furthermore the controls that would result from high fixed prices would destroy the farmer's freedom of action and the payments bankrupt the Government. Instead, I am advocating compensatory payments on perishables as a supplement to the program already proven workable by experience.

I believe that this program will encourage the changing of feed grains into meat products.

OPPORTUNITY IN FARMING FOR YOUTH

Young men going into farming must have the same opportunities, the same sense of reward for hard work, and an equal chance to combat economic hazards on fair terms that are afforded to the young entrants into other fields. The American farmer has a right, indeed a prior claim, to a chance to build for the future on the foundations of a sound economic position, rather than on the economics of a struggle for survival against the overwhelming weight of industry.

To preserve the agricultural way of life, and to bring the bounty of its production to the full for the mutual interest of farm, industry, and consumer, this must be the goal of our policy. It will require the most complete nonpartisan cooperation, guided by a joint understanding of the meaning of agriculture, to achieve this aim.

But it must be brought about soon. If the farmer's destiny is destroyed, much of the hopes of freedom and representative self-government will be lost, too. By strengthening agriculture, by helping it to meet the intricate questions posed by a new age, this Nation can assure its own ultimate ability to master the tasks that lie ahead.

A WORD OF WELCOME TO VISITING JAPANESE LEGISLATORS

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Speaker, a group of visiting Japanese legislators will be present in Washington in the near future in connection with their trip to this country made for the express purpose of observing our democratic processes. In this connection I cannot help but note the recent demonstration wherein democracy failed of its purpose. I am referring to the action of some members of the Boston City Council in barring from their proceedings this visiting delegation. The action is regrettable, but I cannot help but note that certainly these gentlemen are witnessing at first hand the strange ways in which democracy works. Perhaps the action at Boston has served a purpose. Certainly it has focused our attention on the purpose of their visit, which purpose is commendable, indeed. It is altogether fitting that I call your attention to the fact that both the Governor and legislative body of Massachusetts have welcomed this visiting group. I applaud their action.

Surely it is for us at this time to demonstrate our faith and hopes that mankind will rededicate itself to those principles of justice and selflessness without which no lasting honorable peace can be attained.

It was my opportunity recently to visit Japan. While there I witnessed the unusual progress that has been made and particularly insofar as the political reorientation of the Japanese people is concerned.

Permit me to read to you from a letter which I have just received from Mr. Joseph Dodge, prominent financial advisor to General MacArthur. He proceeds as follows:

> In no nation has so much been accomplished with so little direct financial aid; Japan is the only nation that actually has done the things necessary to place its Government fiscal affairs under proper control, in contrast to the need to do so in other nations where it has not been done.
> When these factors are added to the political and strategic stake we have in Japan, it seems to me we should do everything within reason to maintain the financial stabilization and encourage the political and labor stabilization that has been achieved so far.

I subscribe to his statements.

As one who fought against the Japanese in World War II, as a legislator who recently returned to Japan in time of peace, and finally as a citizen, I wish to extend a word of welcome to these Japanese visitors and to wish them well in their sincere efforts to learn the ways of democracy. I feel certain millions of Americans share my sentiments.

(Mr. CARROLL (at the request of Mr. KRUSE) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and to include extraneoous matter.)

THE FARMERS' PROBLEMS AND THE BRANNAN PLAN

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Speaker, I have just listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] in his discussion of the problems of the farmers. I was somewhat amazed, I must say, to hear him endorsing compensatory payments, that is, subsidy payments on perishable commodities, and then turn around and condemn the Brannan plan. I do not think anybody can be confused about that matter. I think everybody recognizes the thing which has been referred to in the press constantly of late as the Brannan plan is the compensatory payment feature on perishable commodities of the recent legislation offered in the House by Secretary of Agriculture Brannan.

The gentleman went on further, or perhaps it was earlier in his speech, when he made reference to the prices dropping from 1929 to 1933, dropping 36 percent on the things that the farmer sells, and production, mind you, only dropping 6 percent in the same length of time. Now, there is a perfect example of just how ineffective the Republican flexible price-support program is in controlling production. You have a perfect case where the prices went down and bankrupted all the farmers and bankrupted the whole country, and did the natural law of supply and demand stop the production? It did not. According to my Republican colleague's own figures, production kept right on.

Mr. Speaker, I submit to you that the only way American agriculture can get its house in order as industry does is to submit to controls. I am a farmer myself. I like freedom just as much as anybody, but I am telling you this: That I prefer regulation, if you will, to bankruptcy.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In response to what my friend from California has said, I want it perfectly clear, so far as I am concerned, I do not want regimentation for our farmers. I also want it perfectly clear, and I tried to make it clear in my previous statement that I am opposed to the Brannan plan.

Mr. WHITE of California. I think the gentleman made that perfectly clear. I think it is apparent to almost everyone the only reason the gentleman and his party are opposed to it is that it has the name Brannan on it and that it has been advanced by the Democratic administration.

Mr. Speaker, I want to talk a litle bit further about this so-called flexible-price proposition which the Republicans have offered and which the Farm Bureau is sponsoring. To me it is not only flexible, it is collapsible. The parity formula itself is flexible. Just check up down here at the Department of Agriculture and you will find every single month the parity figure is different, which proves that it is flexible within itself even if the farmers got 100 percent of parity. And speaking of parity I wish they would change that word "parity" and eliminate it and just use the words "fair prices"—why is not the farmer entitled to 100 percent of fair prices? He has to sell his goods in an unprotected market, yet he buys in a protected market. He could buy Czechoslovakian shoes cheaper in this country, and many other things much cheaper if he did not have to pay an import duty. Industry is fully protected by an import tariff. Labor is fully protected from cheap goods from abroad; but the American farmer has no protection. Yet, when we want to give him a square deal and protect him with what I call fair prices—not parity; that word is too technical and most people do not look into it to see what it means. It means fair prices. I submit the American farmer is entitled to 100 percent fair prices.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of California. I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I disclaim any representation of the Republican Party. I want to make that perfectly clear. I spoke in my own behalf, and made a tentative suggestion, which I hope may be considered when permanent legislation is considered for the benefit of the farmer. I am one of those who is inclined to think that farm legislation belongs in a category which is nonpartisan.

Mr. WHITE of California. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Because all of us who represent farming districts do not come from either one or the other of the parties, but each of us who represents an agricultural area has a sympathy, and I think perhaps an understanding of the problems of everyone else who represents an agricultural area.

Mr. WHITE of California. I agree with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. WHITE] has expired.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 947. An act for the relief of the Baggett Transportation Co., Inc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1059. An act for the relief of John W. Wagner; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1146. An act for the relief of Francis W. Dodge; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1423. An act for the relief of Alex Morningstar; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1769. An act to reimburse the Stebbins Construction Co.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1863. An act for the relief of Fremont Rider; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1933. An act for the relief of C. L. Lefingwell and others; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2070. An act for the relief of the Clark Funeral Home; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2314. An act to provide for holding a term of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon at Eugene; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2339. An act for the relief of the Davis Grocery Co., of Oneida, Tenn.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2385. An act for the relief of Edward C. Ritche; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 2507. An act to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to grant to the East Bay Municipal Utility District, an agency of the State of California, an easement for the construction and operation of an interceptor sewer pipe line in and under certain Government-owned lands comprising a part of the Maritime Alameda shipyard, Alameda, Calif.; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 2520. An act to authorize the sale of certain allotted devised land on the Winnebago Reservation, Nebr.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

S. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mrs. NORTON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 322. An act to transfer funds to the town of Craig, Alaska;

H. R. 746. An act for the relief of the legal guardian of August Michela, a minor;

H. R. 2585. An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide for exemption from duty of certain metallic impurities in tin ores and concentrates when such impurities are not recovered;
